Here are the three graces of Neptune, a trio of brave fellows who have done some service to the state, and now enjoy their otium cum dignitate (which we take the liberty of translating into "good beef and potatoes"), as veterans entitled to their country's gratitude should do.

The respectable old gentleman on the left is Joseph Burgin, about sixty years of age, first drew his breath at Bishop Stortford, and believes himself to be the senior pensioner in the hospital, which he entered in the year 1806. He served in the Vanguard, Nelson's flag ship, in the battle of the Nile—was paid off at the peace of Amiens, but subsequently impressed, and again served with Nelson in the Victory in the battle of Trafalgar. He was stationed at the 14th gun on the middle deck, and lost his left leg in the middle of the fight through a shot from the Buccentaur. Enjoys a pension of £14 per annum. He is a fine specimen of the sturdy class, and could tell many a tale of war by flood and field. At one of the guns near to Burgin the man employed to sponge it was working away steadily at his duty, when he observed a French seaman, of the Redoutable, outside the port, sitting astride the muzzle of his gun, and employed in a similar way with himself. "Hear a-hand Johnny," said the tar, "or I'll have a slap at you presently." Johnny did not appear, however, to relish his position, and he was rather awkward in his movements. The Englishman smartly finished his job, and then looking up at the Frenchman, and perceiving that he was still at work, he rammed the dirty sponge into the latter's face, exclaiming, "What! not done yet? Take that you lubber!" The Frenchman sprang in-board as well as he could, and never made his appearance outside the port again. The British seaman is now boatswain of the Swiftsure 74.

The individual in the centre of the group is JAMES CONNELL, about sixty-six years of age. He served in the Channel Fleet in the Ternhle, and in the Hercule in the early part of the war, and was also in the Victory at Trafalgar, stationed on the main deck at the seventh gun. Altogether has been twelve years in the service, and never received a wound.

The veteran on the right hand is GEORGE FRENCH, aged sixty-six. He entered the service some time before the peace of Amiens, and was also in the Victory at Trafalgar, second captain of the fifth gun on the middle deck. He afterwards belonged to the Ocean, and then to the Ville de Paris, carrying the flag of Lord Collingwood. He continued in the fleet till the peace; was never wounded, and altogether completed fourteen years servitude.

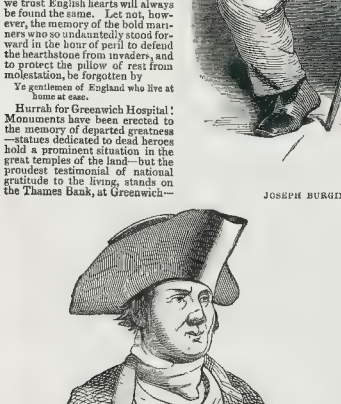
JOHN MANNING,

another of Nelson's heroes, now about seventy-three years of age. In the early part of the war he served in the North Sea under Duncan, watching the Dutch fleet in the Texel, and was afterwards in the victory at Trafalgar. He was next drafted into the Ocean and other ships, and was with his old shipmate Daniel Fearhall, in the Milford at Trieste. During his service of twelve years he was engaged in many boat-fights, and always behaved well in action.

JOSEPH BROWN

served in the Victory at Trafalgar, and in various other ships, chiefly in the Mediterranean—the whole period of his time being fifteen years; was in more than one battle, but never got wounded.

Would our space admit, what a series of narratives might be gleaned



JOSEPH BROWN.

JOHN MANNING,

from these seven pensioners Tough yarns in abundance, such as inspire the mind of youth with an ardent desire to breast the foaming surge, and seek for "reputation" at the cannon's mouth." They are nearly the last of a race that is becoming extinct. The Jack Rattlins and Tom Pipes of the days of yore, who, when they beheld the grin of grim death right in their very face, grinned at him again, and were ready to throw a shot, or fight in his eye. Brave veterans, fare-ye-well! May age leave its infirmities behind as it creeps over your frames!—every comfort to you whilst in the land of the living! and when you ship your cables here may the angel of mercy pilot you safely to snug berths in another and a better world! Farewell!

EASTER MONDAY RECREATIONS.

British Museum.—On Monday the number of visitors to this national establishment was 21,839. On last Easter Monday there were 18,342, making an increase of 2,907. Out of this large number of persons there was not a single individual rejected on the ground of intoxication. The police arrangements were under the management of Sergeant Reason, A division, who had twelve officers under his command. The behaviour of the visitors was most orderly, and there was not a single case of damage. A great disappointment was experienced by persons taking children under eight years of age, who by the regulations of the Museum, are refused admission. This restriction is likely to be removed from a suggestion of the trustees. Thousands of persons during the day paraded round Magna Charta, the original palladium of English liberty, always an object of great attraction.

The National Gallery.—Nearly 10,000 persons inspected this national depository of paintings on Monday; their conduct was generally unexceptionable.

St. Paul's Cathedral.—This grand national edifice had less than fifty visitors, which may be accounted for by the continuance of the exorbitant charge of 4s. 2d. to view the whole.

Westminster Abbey.—There is, it would seem, a general repugnance to paying at all for admission to view public buildings, and consequently, though for some time past the amount charged to view the monuments and other interesting objects in this venerable edifice has been reduced to 6d., the visitors have not been near so numerous as might have been expected, and on Monday the numbers were fewer than usual on holidays; the exact number could not, however, be accurately ascertained, for one attendant said, "I don't know;" another, "We must not say; the numbers are very insignificant, but we don't want to be noticed in the papers." Another said, "You had better ask Mr. Hume." The last verger (or attendant) applied to, said the number of visitors was about 400, but it is understood there was not more than half that number.

The Tower of London.—The armoury and the jewel room at the Tower were honoured with the presence of hundreds, who, while visiting the "lions of London," could not refrain from paying a visit to that place, which forms a prominent a feature in the annals of their country. Among the new features are several guns of Chinese manufacture, captured by the British during the recent campaign in China

The Thames Tunnel was decked out in the same way as on the occasion of the fancy fair, and although the number of persons passing through it was not so great as at the fancy fair, still a goodly number paid it a visit on their way to Greenwich.

LONDON OUT OF TOWN.

Easter Monday has been from time immemorial the great saturnalia of Londoners, and at one time every suburban village had its fair, its revelries, and amusements of every description, for the recreation of the people; but licentiousness and outrages crept in, and an act of Parliament swept them all away, with the exception of Greenwich, which, for many years was the only suburban fair at Easter and Whitsuntide. Last year Stepney fair was revived, after a lapse of twenty-five years; and so great has been the improvement in the manners of the people, that only twelve charges of theft and disorder arose out of it, at Easter and Whitsuntide, a less number than came under the cognizance of the police during the Temperance Meetings of Father Mathew in the same neighbourhood. Stepney fair has been again revived this year, and on a much larger scale. As it is decidedly superior to Greenwich, though wanting the beautiful park and magnificent hospital of the latter, it deserves to be first described. Stepney fair was an appurtenance to the Manor of Stebon-heath, and was formerly held in the fields between the George, in the Commercial-road, and Stepney Old Church. The greater part of these fields have been built upon during the last twenty years, and are covered with houses, churches, a police court and station, and two squares have been laid out upon them. There are two moderate sized fields, one opposite the Maid and the Magpie, of about six acres, and the other behind the new tavern called the Prince of Wales, opposite the Thames Police Court, containing about two acres, still unoccupied. The former contained an immense number of swings, roundabouts, spar and dwarf shows, whelligigs, carts, booths. In one corner was a booth two hundred feet long, and about forty feet wide, conducted by Alger's daughter, and fitted up for dancing in a very tasteful manner. At sunset it was lighted up with variegated lamps, and ornamented with the crown and anchor on front, and had a very splendid appearance. There was an orchestra erected in the middle of the booth, the fitting up of which cost the proprietors, Mr. and Mrs. Pearson, £700. The dancers on most nights easily filled, and ever and anon the crowd refreshed themselves with ham and beef, and ale, of which the quality was good and the consumption enormous. There were three theatres in the same field—Johnson's, Powell's and Richardson's; but the proprietor of the last has, it is said, usurped the name of the illustrious showman, who has been long gathered to his fathers; certain it is, however, the entertainments within and without appeared to please all who witnessed them. In the same field were numerous carts, with smoking guns and gentlemen in wild beasts, and wonders of every description. The dust kept up all day was tremendous, and the swings and roundabouts were in constant motion. The division of police, who mustered on the occasion, had an irksome duty to perform, and did it with great moderation. At nine o'clock the fun and hilarity were at their height, but the greatest good humour prevailed, and very few occasions happened to call for the interference of the police. Stepney fair was a profitable one for those who catered for the amusements of the public. It lasted three days.

Greenwich fair presented no new features of interest this year, Nelson Lee and Johnson, the lessees of the Pavilion Theatre, and the successors of Richardson, were in the old spot, with a very efficient company, new pieces, new scenery, and new decorations; and if the actors did not always speak what was set down for them, they made their audiences hear what they did say, no easy task amidst the din of a fair. The Crown and Anchor booth was as large as ever, and if the numerous dancers who footed it on quadrilles, cotillions, mazurkas, galloppades, and waltzes, did not trip it on the light fantastic toe with the same grace as at Almack's, they certainly did it with more vigour. At one time there were not less than 400 well-dressed ladies and lasses dancing in the booth, with the barometer at about 120. The consumption of ham and beef here was enormous. Dancing seems to give the frequenters of Greenwich fair an appetite. The usual variety of gingerbread stalls, swings, booths, and shows, were to be seen at this fair, which was excessively crowded: indeed, it was a work of great difficulty to pass through it at all. The place is very circumscribed, compared to what it was, and if the fair is to be continued (and it is so popular it can never be put down) it ought to be held in a more open spot.

The town of Greenwich, the Park, the Hospital, and its environs, were crowded beyond all former occasions. The view from the top of Greenwich-hill was a most interesting one. Thousands were seen collected on the greensward below, numerous groups were pouring down Holdey-hill, and great numbers made their way to Blackheath and the adjacent fields, to inhale a purer atmosphere than they have been able to breathe in London. The Royal Hospital and the Painted Hall were visited by as many as could get in. Certainly the town of Greenwich was never known to be so full of Cockneys before, and vast was the consumption of provisions, malt liquors, and tea, which the licensed victuallers took care to provide for their visitors. Train after train on the railway, and steamer after steamer on the Thames brought the Londoners in quick succession; upwards of 30,000 landed at the Greenwich-pier (now in ruins) and the Watermen's floating pier during the day. The railway carriages must have brought down as many, and others in the omnibuses, cabriolets, and thousands on foot from the metropolis and surrounding country, swelled the numbers beyond calculation. "All the world and his wife," to use an old English saying, appeared to be holiday making. Labour of all kinds was suspended, and every one who had a 6d. to spend repaired to Greenwich or Stepney.

The steam-boat piers were thronged all day with people waiting to proceed down the river by steam; the boats of the Watermen's Company and the old companies carried prodigious freights. All the tugs were put in requisition for the Greenwich trade, and the river was like a rough sea all day. At hoaday times, from 2000 to 3000 watermen were employed taking passengers to and from Greenwich, and they gave employment to as many watermen; but steam watermen have superseded them, which travel at the rate of 14 miles an hour. The over-crowding of the steamers is much to be condemned.

There was an interesting scene at the Watermen's Pier Limehouse-hole, in the morning. The Pearl, a Gravesend steamer, embarked upwards of 500 persons, consisting of the workmen and apprentices in the employ of Messrs. Seaward and Co., the engineers, at Mill-wall, and the wives and families of the married men. They were provided with an excursion to Sea-reach, and a dinner at Gravesend, at the expense of the firm. They entertain an annual treat in a similar manner on Tuesday. The voyagers returned in the evening highly delighted with their trip, and very grateful for the liberality of Messrs. Seaward and Co., who have set an example worthy of imitation.

LITERATURE.

A New Spirit of the Age.

The second volume of this very unequal work opens with a sketch of Alfred Tennyson, for whom Mr. Horne claims "the title of a true poet of the highest class of genius, and one whose writings may be considered as peculiarly lucid to all competent understandings that have cultivated a love for poetry." this is, with a vengeance, most orcular eulogy. The succeeding sketch of T. B. Macaulay is, to our minds, far more to the purpose: though extending but to a few pages, they are full of points. Thomas Hood and the late Theodore Hook are contrasted in the next paper, especially in treatment: here is a specimen —

Mr. Hood's sympathies are with humanity; they are not often genial, because of a certain grotesque sadness that pervades them, but they are always kindly. He is liberal-minded, and of an independent spirit. His inner life is clearly displayed by his various writings. Mr. Hook had no sympathies with humanity for its own sake, but only as developed and modified by aristocratic circumstances and fashionable tastes. He was devoted to splendid externals. He may be said to have had no inner life—except that the lofty image of a powdered footman, with golden aiguillettes and large white calves, walked with a great air up and down the silent avenues of his mind. But the life of animal spirits, Hook possessed in an eminent degree. They appeared inexhaustible, and being applied as a sort of "steam" to laughing gas to set in motion his invention and all its powers, and his surprising facility of extemporaneous song-making, it is no wonder that his company was so much in request, and that he was regarded as the delightful time-killer and incentive to wine by the "high bloods of the upper circles." He made them laugh at good things, and forget themselves. He also made them drink. Thus are red-herrings and anchovies used. Sad vision of a man of genius, as Hook certainly was, assiduously pandering to perverse appetites, and selling his birth right for the hard and thankless servitude of pleasing idle hours and pampered vanities. The expenses, the debts, the secret drudgery, the spitting head-aches and heart's misery he incurred, in order to maintain his false position in these circles, are well known; and furnish one more warning to men of genius and wit, of how dearly, how ruinously, they have to pay for an invitation to a great dinner, and a smile from his Grace. The man of moderate means who usually dines at home, saves many bendes his independence; but the man who is always "dining out"—let him look to his pocket, as well as his soul.

Mr. Hood in private, offers a marked contrast to all that has been said of Theodore Hook. In nothing perhaps more than in this—that Hook was "audible, and full of vent," and Hood is habitually retiring and silent. Mr. Hood was originally intended for an engraver; but abandoned the profession, probably because a better could not be found.

Mr. Hood displayed a dashing physique; Mr. Hood rather resembles a gentleman of a serious turn of mind, who is out of health. Within the unpromising outside and melancholy appearance, lies, however, a genius of a most quaint humour, a heart of strong emotions, and a spirit of kindliness towards all the world.

Harriet Martineau and Mrs. Jameson, who are next passed in review, are thus unsatisfactorily treated: having both advocated a remodelling of our institutions, with regard to their own sex. "The one represents the intellect of the question, the other the feeling: one brings to it an acute abstract comprehension, the other all the sympathies of woman: one reasons from observation, the other from experience; one has been roused to the cause by general benevolence, the other, probably, by personal suffering." Thus: "it is evident that these two fine-minded women have been led to the same opinions by totally different circumstances, and hence they hold them with a difference." Sheridan Knowles and William Macready are then called up, as "the dramatic spirits of the age," or rather as pegs whereon the writer may hang a long string of opinions on the acted and unacted drama, and certain opprobrious compliments to "clever writers" for the stage: the estimates of the genius of Knowles and Macready are, upon the whole, fairly drawn; although the admirers of the latter may start at the assertion that "he has wrested the forms of more men of genius and talent than any other individual on record:" we hope the reviewer himself has not been included in this sweeping wreck. However,—

Mr. Macready's merits as an actor are far greater than his defects; let us therefore contemplate the former, chiefly. He is the first artist on the stage. On all those innumerable points of art connected with the stage, which he has studied from his youth, there is no one who possesses more knowledge or skill in their application; and no one possesses both in an equal degree. He is rarely "at home" in anything new, either of principle or practice, without long study. His conception is slow, and by degrees; not quite so slow, however, as to need a certain point. That point is the extremity of all that his study and practice can discover and embody; and it is very much. He has no revelations of genius, no inspirations except those which are unconsciously "given of" at times before great physical energies. If he had any such functions, he would adopt them doubtfully and partially, and so defeat their essential meaning. But when he does embrace the whole of a character (such as Sir Iliam Tell, Coriolanus, Iago, Cardinal Wolsey, King John) he leaves little undone, and all the rest to adorn in the highest degree. He dresses to perfection. He is the only man on the stage who seems to have a fine eye for true harmony of colour. Sometimes he has allowed splendid dresses to be devoted to an equally splendid back-ground of similar colour, but never when he himself is in front of it. If he wore but a blanket, he would have a back-ground that should make that blanket the most precious object in the world, and concentrate upon it all attention. He reads poetry very badly, as to rhythm—broken up—without melody—harsh—unmusical—shattered prose; and yet he speaks with exquisite distinctness, and very impressively, because it is thoroughly natural. There is great truth in all he does—a definite aim, clearly worked out—and those who find little to admire in his acting, the fault is in them.

We see nothing extraordinary in this criticism, except that it tells the truth. The next paper, Miss E. B. Barrett and Mrs. Norton, is complimentary to the genius of these two highly-gifted women.

The prominent characteristics of these two poetesses may be designated as the struggles of woman towards freedom of thought, and the sufferings of woman's affections. They are impressed with a sense of injustice, and feels the need of human love: the other is troubled with a sense of mortal ly, and aspires to identify herself with etherial existences. The one is more objective, the other more subjective; the one taking the tone of complaint and the amplification of private griefs the other too often displays an energetic morb dity on on the subject of death, together with a certain predilection for the horrible. Both are intellectual artists: the one in dealing with subjects of domestic interest: the other in designs from sacred subjects, poems of religious tendency, or of the supernatural world. Mrs. Norton is beautifully clear and intelligible in her narrative and manner of thought and feeling; Miss Barrett has great occasional obscurity, but not an equal power in construction. The one is all womanhood; the other all wings. The one writes from the dictates of a human heart in al the eloquence of beauty and individuality; the other like an inspired priestess—not entirely a most truthful heart but a heart that is devoted to religion, and whose individuality is cast upward in the divine affiatus, and dissolved and carried off in the recipient breath of angelic ministrants.

"Banim and the Irish Novelists," the next paper, merely glances at the author of the O'Hara Tales, Lover, Carleton, Banim, and Mrs. Hall. Then, are coupled Robert Browning and J. W. Marston, both of whom "are artists of men of clay"—the one constantly, in fact, turning tragedy into a spasmodic skeleton, the other carrying the appointments of what is technically and degradingly termed 'a coat and breeches comedy,' into the tragic arena, and wounding Art with real life weapons:" perhaps the reader may not need to be told that the "Patrician's Daughter" and "Strafford" are the plays here alluded to. Mr. Browning's poem of "Sordello," by the way, appears to have captivated the reviewer, who tells us gravely, that it is "a beautiful gallery of pictures," and that in its fit place among the sister spheres, met with some accident, which gave it such a jar that a multitude of things half slipt into each other's places." It is pure Italian in all its materials. There is not one atom of British ink in the whole composition. Nay, there is no ink in it, for it is all written in Tuscan grape-juice, embrowned by the sun. It abounds in things addressed to a second sight, and we are often required to see double in order to apprehend its meaning.

The succeeding papers—Sir E. L. Bulwer and W. H. Ainsworth—we are disposed to rate but lowly. The sketch of Mrs. Shelley, too, is slight, and far from striking: that of Robert Montgomery is intended for its very reverse—a fine mind out of tune and out of time altogether. The paper on Thomas Carlyle is more sterling stuff: the following is, perhaps, one of the best characteristics to be found throughout the work:—

Leigh Hunt and Carlyle were once present among a small party of equally well-known men. It chanced that the conversation turned with these two—both first-rate talkers, and the others sat well pleased to listen. Leigh Hunt had said something about the Islands of the Blest, or El Dorado, or the Millennium and was flowing on in his bright and hopeful way, when Carlyle dropt some heavy tree-trunk across Hunt's pleasant stream, and banked it up with philosophical doubts and objections at every interval of the speaker's joyous progress. But the unmixed Radical never ceased his overflowing acclamations, nor the saturnine Carlyle his infinite demurs to those finite flourishings. The listeners laughed and applauded by turns; and had now fairly pitted them against each other, as the philosophes and the Philistines of the Millennium. The combat continued with all that ready wit and philosophy, that mixture of pleasantry and profundity, that extensive knowledge of books and character, with their ready application in arguments or illustration, and that perfect ease and good-nature which distinguish each of these men. The opponents were so well matched that it was quite clear the contest would never come to an end. But the night was far advanced, and the party broke up: they rose, and leaving the close room, the candles and the arguments behind them, suddenly found themselves in presence of a most brilliant star-light night. They all looked up. "Now," thought Hunt, "Carlyle's done for!—he can have no answer to that!" "There!" shouted Hunt, "look up there! look at that glorious harmony, that sings with infinite voices an eternal song of hope in the soul of man." Carlyle looked up. They all remained silent to hear what he would say. They began to think he was silenced at last—he was a mortal man. But out of that silence came a few low-toned words, in a broad Scotch accent. And who, on earth, could have anticipated what the voice said? "Eh! it's a sad sight!"—Hunt and down set a stone step. They all laughed—then looked very thoughtful. Had the finite measured itself with infinity, instead of surrendering itself up to the influence? Again they laughed—then looked each other good night, and betook themselves homeward with slow and serious pace. There might be some reason for sadness, too. That brilliant firmament probably contained infinite worlds, each full of strugal ing and suffering beings—if beings who had to die—for life in the stars implies that those bright worlds should also be full of graves; but all that life, like ours, knowing not whence it came, nor whither it goeth, and the brilliant universe in its great movements having, perhaps, no more certain knowledge of itself, nor of its ultimate destination, than had one of the suffering specks that compose this small spot we inherit.

The closing paper is devoted to Henry Taylor, and the author of "Festus," and displays little that is noticeable, except a stringent spirit towards the first named writer.

"The New Spirit of the Age," will, probably, be read far beyond its merits: for it will disappoint those who look for high criticism, or any superior development of the characteristics of genius. Neither is there that abundance of personal anecdote in these volumes which might be expected. At the same time, we should mention that the present is but a portion of the design of the work, which may rebut in charge of incompleteness, or, to some degree, partiality in selecting the subjects. The volumes are embellished with a few portraits of extreme brilliancy, both as regards the originals and the engravers.

FINE ARTS.

The Pilgrim's Progress, illustrated by twenty-two Designs in Outline, made expressly for the Society of the Art-Union of London, by Henry C. Selous, and engraved by Henry Moses. Art-Union, Trafalgar square.

Perhaps no country can boast of a more extraordinary man than John Bunyan, the author of the famous allegory called "The Pilgrim's Progress." He was born obscurely, at Elstow, in Bedfordshire, in 1628, and, after a life of strange vicissitudes, died in 1688. He commenced his career in the humble calling of Christopher Sly, namely, a tinker. He subsequently became a soldier, and ultimately entered the church militant as a zealous preacher of the gospel. There is a certain religious gloom pervading his extraordinary work, but all who have any admiration for the creative powers, which can embody passions so powerfully, that in the form of a narrative they seem to be real flesh and blood—nay, even historical personages—must confess the mighty genius exhibited in the wonderfully imagined, and as truthfully sustained, allegory of "The Pilgrim's Progress." We have ever had a greater admiration for clever etchings or outlines than for finished engravings; there is always something left to the imagination to fill up, which an improving fancy on the part of the spectator never fails to supply. Of course, we speak only of the productions of a Hogarth, who, in one single picture, could tell the story of a life by the help of his powerful and witty accessories. Since the fifteenth century, in the days of Albert Durer (who, by the way, was the first engraver on wood), outline made but little advance, till Retsch, the German artist, brought forth his illustrations of Goëthe's "Faust." These models of perfection were succeeded by a host of imitators, in different degrees of success. The younger Howard produced some clever things, as also did many other artists, whom our space will not allow us to enumerate as they deserve, in their respective merits.

The artists who have executed the present work are entitled to the highest praise. Mr. Selous, as the embodier of the leading incidents in the extraordinary allegory already mentioned, has succeeded in uniting the most graceful drawing with back-ground thoughts or imaginations of his own, which serve to be so many illustrations additional to the faithful perscriptions of old Bunyan's prosopopeia. The first, which represents Christian asleep, or rather as the typical composure of his mind, watched over by angels, and surveyed with attentive contemplation by the Demon, is a beautiful drawing. The next, wherein his Pilgrimage is equally good. Christian passing the Valley of the Shadow of Death is, perhaps, a little deformed, by too many grotesque shapes, but the indistinct gigantic and winged form in the upper part of the picture is very sublime. In the Temptations of Vanity Fair, we are reminded of Retsch's View of Life in Faust; but it exhibits a wonderful deal of original genius also. Christian and Hopeful beholding the Fate of the Apostate contains some beautiful drawing and design, as also does the terminating scene of Christian and Hopeful entering the Celestial City, which is very poetically treated, for the subject is spiritualised, and not considered in a plain matter-of fact way Altogether, these outlines are an honour to the Society whose liberality has produced them, to the artists who had the genius and skill to design and execute them, and, finally, to the country which through them can boast of such a high state of art.

NEW MUSIC.

No. 1. Bouquet Royal Valse; composed for her Majesty's state balls, by Jullien.—No. 2. Les Metamorphoses Valses; composées p ur Les Bals de la Cour D'Angleterre, par Hermann Koenig—No 3 La Valse a deux temps; composée pour Les Bals de la Cour D'Angleterre, par Jullien.—No. 4. The Bird of Paradise Waltz; composed by Hermann Koenig.—No. 5. The English Quadrille; by Jullien. Jullien, Little Maddox-street, New Bond-street.

No. 1 is prettily graceful, not only dansante, but chantante, particularly in the first valse. At page 9, where passage amoroso occurs, there is some pretty counterpoint.

No. 2. Perhaps there is a little too much indulgence in countertime in this series, but it is nevertheless pleasing and effective à la Strauss.

No. 3. This valse is very telling, but we do not exactly understand its title. There is nothing of deux temps, in our acceptation of the phrase, about it.

No. 4. The chief charm of this set, and we may say of all the foregoing, is imparted by the varied orchestral instrumentation. The pianoforte part is almost the merest outline of the quadrille. Herr Koenig himself is a charmer, but we can not expect a similar effect from any single instrument.

No. 5. M. Jullien might have made a more complimentary selection of English airs for this set. The one most commonly called "Home, sweet home," is not English, but German. Altogether, however, M. Jullien's (we beg pardon)—Jullien's publications will prove a most pleasant addition to the ball-room and private soirée library, and we cannot do them a greater injustice. Herr Koenig himself is a charmer, but we can not expect a similar effect from any single instrument.

No. 3 M. Jullien might have made a more complimentary selection of English airs for this set. The one most commonly called "Home, sweet home," is not English, but German. Altogether, however, M. Jullien's (we beg pardon)—Jullien's publications will prove a most pleasant addition to the ball-room and private soirée library, and we cannot do them a greater injustice. Herr Koenig himself is a charmer, but we can not expect a similar effect from any single instrument.

Polka.—By Jullien.

It is waste of time to consider this nonsense. The weather-cock heads of the Parisians have been delighted always by any innovation, but never imported anything more ridiculous or ungraceful than this Polka. It is a hybrid confusion of Scotch Lilt, Irish Jig, and Bohemian Waltz, and needs only to be seen once to be avoided for ever!

Rossini's magnificent "Semiramide" could at no time have been better played than it is likely to be on Thursday, at Her Majesty's Theatre. On this occasion, we are sure to have Rossini's splendid music done justice to: Fornasari supports the character of Assur, to which his deep tones and ample force last season. We are to witness the extraordinary feature of two such vocalists as Grisi and Favanti blending their efforts in the same opera; Grisi taking the character of the Assyrian Queen, Semiramide, and Favanti that of the youthful warrior, Arsace. In addition to this superb opera, there will be produced for the first time a new divertissement, of which report speaks much. Of Carlotta Grisi it is almost impossible to say too much. We need not point to the delicacy and the finish which she imparts to all she does, and the readiness and feeling she displays in those little pantomimic touches, which are recognised as soon as seen. We anticipate a crowded house from this triple attraction.

THE OLYMPIC.—Two pieces are presented at this Theatre on Easter Monday—one a drama, entitled "The Signal," by Mr. J. S. Coyne, which was most successful; and the other a capital burlesque, called "Cinderella; or, The Great Fairy and the Little Glass Slipper." From the latter entertainment created great amusement by the manner in which the ballet of Her Majesty's Theatre was burlesqued.

DEATH OF LORD ABINGER.

We have to announce the demise of Lord Abinger, Lord Chief Baron of the Exchequer, which, although not an unexpected event, took place on Sunday, at two o'clock, P.M., at Bury St. Edmund's. An express was received in Springgardens on Sunday evening, which proved the final close of the life of this noble lord for the event which has so soon followed. The express stated that a change for the worse had taken place, and it was not thought possible that his lordship could survive the day. Early on Monday morning Mr. Brandy Cooper arrived in town, and was the bearer of the intelligence of the noble and learned lord's demise. His lordship expired in the presence of Lady Abinger and several members of his family, but he never appeared to regain consciousness after the first moment of the attack.

The late Lord Abinger (James Scarlett, first Baron) was Doctor of Civil Law and a Privy Councillor, created Baron Abinger in 1835, brother of the late Sir William Scarlett, Chief Justice of Jamaica, and father of Captain (late Lord Campbell); was Attorney-General in the Wellington administration, and sat in the House of Commons in 1830 as Mr. and Sir James Scarlett shortly previous to his being raised to the peerage.

The deceased nobleman was a native of Jamaica, where his family had been long resident, and he died considerable property. His brother was many years the Chief Justice of the island The subject of this brief sketch was sent to England at an early age for the purpose of education; and at the age of seventeen was entered at Trinity College, Cambridge. Having selected the law as a profession, he became a member of the Inner Temple, and was, in due course, called to the bar. He rose rapidly to a high position as an advocate. His commanding appearance, fine flow of spirits, colloquial style, and perfect perception of the temper of the different juries he addressed, gave him access to their feelings, and placed their judgments under his control. Business poured in upon him in his private book recorded an amount of fees beyond the most sanguine expectations, and his bag every day showed by its bulk that whatever causes were entered for trial Mr. Scarlett was engaged either for plaintiff or defendant. In 1816, Lord Eldon gave a silk gown to the successful barrister, who henceforth took his stand as a leader of the foremost class, both in Westminster Hall and on the Northern Circuit. Mr. Scarlett now aspired to Parliamentary honours, and on the occasion contested the borough of Lewes, but was defeated. Having avowed himself a Whig in politics, he was indebted to the late Lord Fitzwill am for his first introduction to the House of Commons, as member for the borough of Peterborough. His first speech in that assembly was in the debate on the finances of the nation (1819), in which he urged the expediency of carrying out Mr. Pitt's project of applying the sinking fund in aid of the deficiency of the revenue; and accordingly it was immediately upon the tone assumed by Castlereagh and Vansittart, who had intimated that unless three millions additional taxation were imposed, the Ministry must resign. The amelioration of the criminal code also was found in Mr. Scarlett a frequent advocate. He supported Sir S. Romilly and Sir James Mackintosh in their attempts to remove capital punishment, in a great variety of cases from the statute book; and upon a resolution being passed by the House of Commons in favour of this object, Mr. Scarlett was placed on the committee to inquire and report to the house on the subject. Mr. Scarlett's chief effort in Parliament was a speech on bankers bringing in a bill to amend the Poor-laws. On this occasion he took a loftier flight. He stood for his Alma Mater, the University of Cambridge and was unsuccessful. Peterborough received him on his defeat, and sent him back to Parliament as its representative. His future years as a Member of the Commons were "few and far between." Still his social qualities rendered him a favourite. When Mr. Canning was made Premier, Mr. Scarlett, with most of the Whigs supported him against the Tory confederacy which was found in Mr. Peel's anti-Catholic relief Bill, and was instantly dismissed from office by the Duke of Wellington, who, in conjunction with Sir Robert Peel, had now discovered that the removal of civil disabilities from the Roman Catholics of Ireland could no longer be withheld without danger to the country. The Duke of Wellington offered the vacant post to Sir James Scarlett, who accepted it, stood again for Peterborough, and was re-elected. From this date a marked change was perceptible in Sir James Scarlett's politics, which became completely Conservative in their principle and tendencies. At the election which followed the death of George IV., Sir James Scarlett was elected for Maldon. On the accession of the Whigs to office in 1830, Sir James Scarlett's post was conferred by the new administration on Mr. Denman; and from that period to the close of his life, the Whigs encountered the unceasing opposition of their early friend and associate. In the debate on the second reading of the Reform Bill, Sir James Scarlett opposed it in a long speech, although he still expressed a desire to see Parliament reformed to some extent. His name was, of course, found in every division against the bill, and on the election which took place in consequence of the dissolution of the Parliament which passed the measure from his entrance upon public life to his elevation to the peerage and the bench. In alluding to his change of party, we have stated facts which are matters of history. He was not tempted by poverty nor by patronage to desert his colours, and the emoluments of his profession were almost unprecedentedly large. As a judge, Lord Abinger was clear and prompt in his decisions, and, upon the whole, gave satisfaction to the profession. His conduct, as a judge, is matter of opinion: let that opinion be moderated by the reflection, that those who have impugned any act of Lord Abinger when on the bench, are his political opponents It is impossible to divest the mind of party predilections. Of everything which party asperity will say of public men is impossible. Lord Abinger was, we believe, in his seventy-sixth year, having been considerably more than half a century before the public eye.

A portrait of the deceased nobleman will be found in No. 44 (Second Volume) of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

The great Prince of Condé was very expert in a sort of physiognomy, which showed the peculiar habits, motions, and postures of familiar life and mechanical employments. He would sometimes lay wagers with his friends that he would guess, upon the Pont Neuf, what trade persons were of who passed by, from their walk and air.

FRIGHTFUL ACCIDENT.—On Tuesday, at about one o'clock in the afternoon, George Thomas Gambler, a fine little fellow, the son of a timber merchant in No. 26, Old Gravel-lane, after ascending the steps in front of the house, by some accident tumbled into the carriage way in Old Gravel-lane. A waggon belonging to Mr. Charles, a wag beller in Wapping, was passing at the moment, and the poor child rolled right under the vehicle and between the feet of the shaft horse. The animal did not, however, touch it, and the little fellow would have escaped the dreadful fate which just awaited him had it not been for the screams of his affrighted mother. The poor woman on seeing the perilous situation in which her child was placed, and dread ng that the horse would trample it to death, screamed out violently. The waggoner, who up to the time was perfectly unconscious of what had happened, instantly stopped his horses, but the waggon at the moment was ascending the rise to the weigh bridge, and instead of stopping instantly, it receded twelve or eighteen inches, and one of the hind wheels backing over the head of the child crushed it to pieces. Thomas Willett, the waggoner, was taken into custody, and brought to the station-house in King David-lane, A gentleman named Perkins, who had witnessed the accident, attended at the station-hou.e, and declared to the sergeant on duty that not the slightest blame was attributable to the man. On hearing this, and the father of the deceased refusing to make any charge against him, the sergeant allowed Willett to depart on his promising to attend at the inquest.

WHAT IS MYSTERY?

Mystery! Why Life itself 's a mystery.
Love is a mystery, and its causes too.
The universe, at best, is but a world
Shrouded in mystery from its birth to end;
And Death, the greatest mystery of all,
But ends our mysteries, by creating one
No mortal yet could fathom.

SPRING.

Spring is upon us. We have already felt its smiling, and our hearts are opening at its advent. The cold, the mist, the scowl, the gloom, the horror, and the hideousness of winter are being blown to the past in this, and shall be drowned in the weepings of the next, month. Do we not already feel the heart dance in anticipation of the beautiful, while recollection, photographing in its chambers sweet pictures of awakened flowers, green fields, glad birds, and merry groups, makes the spirit walk abroad full and swollen with gratitude and hope. Already we have forgotten the balls, the routs, the late companies, the formal assemblages, and the artificial fun of winter, or associate them in our wearied reminiscence with ache, and languor, and satiety, and dissatisfaction. Spring has come, and the summer is coming! Fancy is up, and carries thought from the past to the future, from the future to the past—the summer that has been, and the summer that will be! "Oh, dear! what a sweet little party—what a delightful trip we had to such or such a place, last year; and we shall have such rare joy in going to such or such a place this summer," is the leaping utterance of every heart. The amusements of the winter may be very excellent, but, somehow, they live not in the memory, like the glories of the summer; or, if they rise, it is like the ghost of Samuel, to terrify and warn. They come upon remembrance alloyed with black associations, and pregnant with the story of joys that were not real—of friends that were but counterfeit—of ill-acquired wealth—and of health lost. They scorch the heart with a sense of their excitement—they seem shrivelled with the heat, the fetor, and the dust, that presided at their birth and marred the fascination of their being. Christmas, it is true, brought health happiness to our several homes. Its advent kindled fancy's lustre, and lit from the echo of his heavy breathing, and the weighty sharers of his penitential tears, to prepare our hearts for the reception of his amiable successor. Nature has brought the earth into her toilet, and will shortly have her dressed for our admiration—the essences and perfumery are being cut their odour some of the smaller ornaments have been put in, while our common mother, all impatient of the milliner's delay, swells up her bosom like an angry duchess, and manifests the beauties that her children love. For with, citizens, she will shortly be dressed, and so enraptured when you behold her, that you will be filled with the wish to "encore" her for ever. Await her with patience, and hope when she is ready she shall invite you to the theatre, take you by the hand and direct your admiration by our experience and our judgment. She will lead you into a thorough understanding of her graces and those summer beauties which, in the aggregate, make her overpowering; she will bring you to that part where you can see best, and be most delighted. We promise you the first introductions, and the richest and most delicious refreshments; in fact, we will be to you as delightful in our companionship as Nature in her show—if you go without us, you shall not have a mullionth of the pleasure that you might, and if you wish our guideship and our converse, show us that you deserve it by your beforehand attentions; this "heart leaps kindly back to kindness," and we have much trust that we shall walk abroad to the enjoyment of this summer with a cordiality, equal if not greater than that which led us into a "conspiracy" to destroy the tedium of the winter.—Correspondent.

SONGS OF THE CIRCUIT.

From Circuit to Circuit although we may roam,
Be it ever so broillese, there's none like the Home;
A fee from the skies p'haps may follow us there,
Which, seek through the Courts, is ne'er met with elsewhere.
Home, Home, sweet sweet Home,
There's none of the Circuits can equal the Home.

When out on the Home, lodgings tempt you in vain.
The railroad keeps cash'd for the Home-bound train;
On the Home the expenses for posting are small,
Give me that—'tis the Circuit, the cheapest of all.
Home, Home, sweet sweet Home,
There's none of the Circuits can equal the Home.—Punch

CHESHIRE CHEESE.

Poor men eat cheese for hunger, rich for digestion. It seems that the ancient British had no skill in the making thereof, till taught by the Romans, and now the Romans learn of us more excellences therein. Cheese is the county of Chester doth afford the best for quantity and quality; and yet their cows are not (as in other shires) housed in the winter; so that it may seem strange, that the hardest kine should yield the tenderest cheese. Change essayed in vain to make the like in other places, though hence they fetched both their kine and dairy maids. It seems they should have fetched their ground too (wherein surely some occult excellency is couched) for else they could not be made. I hear not the like commendation of the butter in this county; and perchance these two commodities are like stars of a different horsion, so that the elevation of the one to eminency is the depression of the other.—FULLER'S Worthies.

SLANDER.

No, 'tis slander;
Whose edge is sharper than the sword; whose tongue
Outvenoms all the worms of Nile; whose breath
Rides on the posting wings, and doth belie
All corners of the world; kings, queens and states,
Maids, matrons, nay the secrets of the grave,
This rigerous slander enters.

SHAKESPEARE.

A STERN TRUTH.

When a girl ceases to blush she has lost the most powerful charm of beauty.

A MEXICAN CHARM

The true-hearted Mexican fair thinks that she is destitute of one of her attractions if she has not a cigar in her mouth; she wafts honied words to her lover from her cigar, lips in edifying fumes, and extends her dimpled arm from beneath the envious concealment of the mantilla, to light a paper cigar, or to adjust that of her lover. How could she fill up the time which she now wiles away in smoking, or how retain the gracious offices of her duenna without such an occasional mark of her favour? If you endeavour to convince her of its unseemliness for so fair a sex, she has a thousand things to say in its defence; yet, to the honour of the ladies of Mexico be it said, they have been the first to yield to the remonstrances of strangers, so that it is daily becoming more rare to see young ladies smoking in public; it is beginning also to disappear at the theatre, and the last to do so in the capital, where it is no longer necessary to have a separate smoking-room for the ladies. —United Service Magazine.

THE BEST SAFEGUARD FROM VICE.

To occupy the mind with useful employments is among the best methods of guarding it from surrendering itself to vice.—RICHARDSON.

THE MARCH OF INTELLECT.

Because, in this day of light and truth, we are much superior to those dark ages in everything that can dignify and bless human nature, let us not think our work completed, or that we have no more to do. The period is approaching hastening when an enlightened race shall look back upon our generation with as much compassion as we now feel for the victims of oppression and superstition in what we are pleased to call the dark ages.—STURM.

THE SHORT PASSAGE TO AMERICA.

Since Sir Valentine Blake has proposed this scheme, it has been taken up in various quarters, by individuals to whom the shortest possible cut to America is a matter of the greatest importance. The plan of Sir Valentine Blake of cutting a canal through the land and carrying a railroad over the sea will be superseded by a newer and a better notion, for it is now in contemplation to erect a steam-boat, by the help of which we may ready to go to any height, that will extend half way across the Atlantic, and this method, added to a plan of dividing the Cape in half, instead of the old practice of doubling it, will, in the opinion of Sir Valentine Blake, exactly achieve the contemplated object.—Punch.

PLEASURE

Is a rose, near which there ever grows the thorn of evil. It is wisdom's work so carefully to cull the rose, as to avoid the thorn; and let its rich perfume exhale to heaven, in grateful adoration of Him who permitted the rose to blow.—ELIZABETH SMITH.

THE LOVE OF PRAISE.

It is very surprising that praise should excite vanity, for if what is said of us be true, it is no more than we knew before, and it cannot raise us in our own esteem; if it be false, it is surely a most humiliating reflection, that we are only admired because we are not known, and that a closer inspection would draw forth censure instead of commendation. Praise can only hurt those who have not formed a decided opinion of themselves, and who are willing, on the testimony of others, to rank themselves higher in the scale of human excellency than their merits warrant.—ELIZABETH SMITH.

THE WIFE.

"It was well that she had the truest comforter to resort to. She knew that a married woman ought to have no friend, in the highest acceptation of the word—no one to whom she can open her heart fully and entirely—except her husband. Her mother was dead, and her only near relative—a warm-hearted old bachelor uncle—had all the confidence she deemed it right to give to any; but she had no thought of complaining of her husband to any human being."

OPENING OF THE CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT.

OPENING OF THE CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT.

On Monday morning the sixth session of the present mayoralty commenced before the Recorder, the Lord Mayor, the Sheriffs, Alderman Sir Chapman Marshall, and other civic authorities.

The opening of the court is a ceremony of considerable interest. The Lord Mayor, attended by the Sword-bearer and Mace-bearer, in the superb state coach, and accompanied by the Sheriffs in their state carriages, proceed to the Sessions House in the Old Bailey; having alighted, a procession is formed by the civic party and the judges, in the Court-yard of Newgate, and they advance upstairs to the court. Our artist has, in the annexed sketch, chosen the moment just before the formation of the procession.

THORWALDSEN!

The great sculptor, Albert (or as he was more often called by those who were familiar with him, Bertel) Thorwaldsen, was born at Copenhagen in the year 1770. His father, who was a native of Iceland, obtained but a poor living as a carver in wood and stone. He was chiefly occupied in cutting the figure-heads of ships, an occupation in which he was frequently assisted by his son. Uneducated, except by Nature, the youthful Thorwaldsen, at the age of eleven, entered the gratuitous school of art at Copenhagen, where his genius soon began to develop itself. In 1787, his seventeenth year, he obtained the gold medal. In 1789 he gained a second prize; and, subsequently, another gold medal. In 1793 he obtained the grand prize, which entitled him to the academical pension of about forty-eight pounds sterling for the term of three years, in order to enable him, as other meritorious students, to improve by a residence in Rome. He accordingly embarked for Italy on the 20th of May, 1796, on board a Danish frigate, and reached Rome on the 8th of March in the following year. (There were no steamers in those times!) "Remote, unfriended, melancholy," still, be it said to England's honour, that the great artist was enabled, through the means afforded to him by the late Mr. Thomas Hope, to remain in Rome and complete his studies. He executed several noble works for his munificent patron, among which is a fine boar, now at the Deepdene, near Dorking. The first production, however, which made Thorwaldsen known at Rome, was a masterly model of Jason, which Mr. Hope commissioned him to execute in marble. Thus his Jason won him "a golden fleece," but "It sate as easily upon him as A robe of silk."

THORWALDSEN.

For there never was a genius of most mighty power, enshrined in a more humble "vesture of decay," than that of Thorwaldsen. He was an enthusiastic admirer of other men's works, but always had a misgiving of the merits of his own. To catalogue them and describe their various beauties, would exceed our space, so we will conclude by saying, a great man is gone—a man who leaves not his fellow behind him.

When a great genius departs from this world, all sympathetic souls must feel that earth has lost a portion of her spiritual vitality. It is true that some mortal remains may be left behind, but they only serve to prove, like ruined temples, the magnificence of the Deity that was once worshipped within them. Other remains, too, less perishable, the product of mental and manual labour, will last as long as marble can endure; but that fame which should have cheered the artist on life's road only kindles or lights up, generally speaking, when he is in the decadence of his days—when a sunset of glory but poorly atones for a morning, noon, and evening of life passed in comparative clouds and obscurity. We do not mean to say that such was the hard fate of Thorwaldsen, for he was distinguished in his native country during his life, although it is only now that he is dead his fame spreads over the face of Europe and the rest of the civilized world. His death, strange to say, has procured him more honours or obsequies than he could possibly have anticipated in his life time—a life time which was solely devoted to his art, or which generously bestowed some hours of its days upon the improvement of others. The following description of his funeral at Copenhagen, will show in what esteem the great sculptor was held by his compatriots.

The body lay in state on the 20th of March, and on the following day the last solemn rites were paid to the remains of the deceased. The ceremony commenced with a dirge composed by Holst and Kung, which was performed by all the students of the Academy of Fine Arts. After this, Dr. Clausen delivered a very beautiful and appropriate oration upon the extraordinary abilities and genius of the deceased. The coffin was then taken down and placed in the hearse, during which the members of the Italian Opera, who were placed in Thorwaldsen's studio, performed a cantata in Italian, written by Speratti, and composed by Holst. The mournful procession was headed by two of the most eminent members of the Academy of the Fine Arts, followed by about 800 students; after them came all Thorwaldsen's countrymen—all the Icelanders now residing in Copenhagen—and then almost without exception, all the artists in the city. The plain open coffin came next, amply ornamented on one side with a beautiful carving of the Fates, after a design from the great master's own hand, and a design representing victory on the other. On the coffin were placed interwoven branches of palms and cypress, but none of the numerous decorations belonging to the deceased sculptor. On the canopy of the hearse was placed one of the last and most beautiful works of the great artist—Hope leaning on an anchor. Next came, immediately after the corpse, as chief mourners, all the members of the Academy of Fine Arts, headed by their President, His Royal Highness the Crown Prince, followed by all the other royal princes, and a great number of the principal officers of state, officers of the army and navy, and upwards of 8000 citizens of all classes. All the streets through which the procession passed, from the Museum to the church of the Holy Ghost, were lined en cavalier with the different companies of trade, with their colours and ensigns covered with crape, and they themselves in deep mourning. The streets from the church of the Holy Ghost to that of Notre Dame, where his last resting-place was prepared, were lined to the same manner by the different regiments of the garrison, and the whole distance from the Museum to the Notre Dame, about an English mile, was, according to the ancient Scandinavian custom, strewed with white sand intermixed with juniper leaves. At the entry of the church his Majesty the King, in deep mourning, received the corpse, and after the coffin had been placed on a catafalque which had been erected for that purpose, the Requiem was performed, that which was written by one of Thorwaldsen's most intimate friends, the celebrated Adam Oehlenschlager, and composed by Gaser. The Bishop of Seeland, the Right Rev. Dr Tryde, then performed the funeral service, and delivered a most eloquent oration, after which the coffin was consigned to its last abode, during which time the students, amounting to several thousands, who had not found admittance into the interior of the church and had placed themselves in the churchyard, sung a hymn, also written and composed for the occasion. Her Majesty and all the royal princesses occupied the royal pew during the whole of the ceremony.

The bells of all the churches in the capital tolled from eleven till two o'clock, and when the procession came in sight, the "Dead March" from Saul was performed.

As was anticipated, Thorwaldsen has left nearly all his property, which is more considerable than was supposed, to the museum that bears his name.

A monument upon a most magnificent scale will be erected to his memory, at the public expense, for which subscription lists have already been opened, headed by his Majesty with the munificent sum of 25,000 dollars.

Thus was deposited the modern Phidias, a genius whose sculpture of another genius, namely, a statue of Byron, lies in the lumber stores of the Custom-house; the Dean of Westminster having objected to its being placed in the Abbey.

APRIL! A SONNET.

"The poetic birds rejoice,
And, for their quiet nests and plenteous food,
Pay with their grateful voice!"—COWLEY

Thou gentle Herald of the flow'ry Spring!
Mother of violet and pale primrose,
(Whose beauty now on every wild bank grows),
Hark! how the joyous birds thy welcomes sing!
Some far up in the dewy sky on wing
Well pois'd—some chattering in the hawthorn hedge,
Some deep-embow'r'd in lonely glen or brake,
And others booming from the watery sedge—
All join'd, a various concert for thy sake
Most musically and most fondly make!
Sweet April! whose dear face so oft appears
The semblance of the brightest thing on earth,
(Which is a lovely, laughing girl in tears)
Thy coming wakes the groves to bloom and mirth! W.

Not many centuries have passed away since our island was covered with primitive forests of oak and pine. From the swamps of Lincolnshire canoes of oak have frequently been exhumed, which indicate both the character of this country and of its inhabitants, in the earlier stages of its history. Many of the early Saxon writers refer to immense forests of oak trees, which covered Britain, and there are individual trees still standing, which formed part of these forests. Even after the Norman conquest, the decrease of oak forests was only very gradual, as it appears that in the time of Henry II. the greater part of England was covered with wood. At this period, London itself was surrounded by a large forest, "in the coverts whereof," says Fitz-Stephen, "lurked bucks and does, wild boars and bulls." Even as late as Henry VII. it was computed that the forests covered one-third of all England. What oaks were in the south, pines were in the north, and Scotland was equally covered with forests as England. There are now but few remnants of the ancient Caledonian forests. The value of the timber has led to the clearing of large districts on the higher hills, whilst the growing of cattle, and the growing of corn, have made them almost to disappear in the plains and lowlands.—Athenæum.

NOOKS AND CORNERS OF OLD ENGLAND.

THE ROYAL FREE GRAMMAR SCHOOL, NEWCASTLE-UPON-TYNE.

This venerable edifice, originally the Chapel of the Hospital of St. Mary, was founded by the piety of our forefathers for the relief of those in poverty and sickness. At the Reformation it met with the ruthless and indiscriminate fate of the majority of benevolent and public institutions, and was denuded of its utility and original purpose. Queen Elizabeth, finding the want of public education, by the abolition of monasteries, to be increasing to an extent alarming even to monarchy, founded in various parts of the kingdom free grammar schools, and amongst others that at present under our notice; stating that, "Moreover, we, after revolving in our mind how much advantage would arise to the com monwealth of England, over which Almighty God has been pleased to place us, that youth should be well grounded from their tenderest years in the rudiments of the true religion, and instructed in learning and good manners, we, &c., order, constitute, and appoint, &c., one free grammar school, which shall be called the Free Grammar School of Queen Elizabeth, in Newcastle-upon Tyne." The corporation of the town, who had charge given them of this public school, immediately applied the hospital of St. Mary to the uses of the seminary, the chapel being converted into a school room, and the other portions of the building to residences for the masters, to which purposes it has been appropriated up to the present period. The recent extensive and magnificent improvements in the town of Newcastle having, however, rendered its situation less applicable to its late purposes, from the din of traffic and encroachments on the playground (locally termed the Spital), it was determined to erect a new building on a more eligible situation, and demolish the ancient relic of piety and learning. Many efforts have been made to preserve it, and there has been much public controversy on the subject. It was proposed by an eminent local artist, Mr. Dobson, to strip it of its modern disfigurements and restore it to its pristine state, adapting it to its original intention—that of a place of public worship. This idea was warmly supported by the Antiquarian and Anglo-Catholic party; but the new corporation have, by a small majority, doomed it to be levelled to the ground.

The scholars who have achieved honourable mention in British history, and received the elements of their fame in the grammar school, are,—Colonel Lilburn, the indomitable republican; the late Lord Chancellor Eldon; Lord Stowell, many years Judge of the High Court of Admiralty; Lord Collingwood, Commander of the Mediterranean Fleet; Sir William Chambers, Judge of the Supreme Court of Judicature at Calcutta; the Rev. Dr. George Hall, late Bishop of Dromore, "a rare instance of the union of severe science and elegant attainments."

ABINGER HALL.

Abinger Hall lies within a short distance of Leith Hill, the highest ground in Surrey, being nearly 1000 feet above the sea level. The Hall is a commodious residence, and is placed on the north side of the Guildford road. It takes its name from the parish in which it is situated—Abinger, which, as Aubrey conjectures, was named from Abin, an eminence, or rising ground; it contains about 900 inhabitants; and, as the late Lord Abinger possessed considerable property in this parish, on his elevation to the peerage, it was selected as the title of the barony.

A memoir of his lordship will be found in another column.

SCENE FROM THE NEW EXTRAVAGANZA OF "THE DRAMA AT HOME," AT THE HAYMARKET THEATRE.

HAYMARKET THEATRE.

On Monday last the entertainments called "Used Up" and "Grist to the Mill," introduced, or rather *re*produced, Mr. and Mrs. Mathews on those boards. The novelty of the evening was a new extravaganza by Planché, entitled "The Drama at Home, or an Evening with Puff." It is one of those hybrid monstrosities which accelerates the fall of the decadent temple, whose utter ruin it would fain deplore, yet throws, by the help of caricature, a contempt upon that which hitherto had been held sacred. The Drama (personified by Mrs Glover) is discovered in the opening scene, all disconsolate amidst the débris of the fane in which she was once worshipped. Her orphan children—Hamlet, Ophelia, the Ghost, Macbeth, &c.—all attempt to condole with their mourning parent. At length Mr. Puff (Mr. C. Mathews) suddenly appears from a trap, and succeeds in dispelling (for awhile) the Muse's fears. She takes new courage, and once more

In vain hope seats herself upon a throne.

Our engraving represents this picturesque scene.

A motley procession is then made to pass before her, caricaturing the productions of other theatres, and insinuating, or rather asserting, that the home of the Legitimate Drama is the Haymarket House. We very much question whether legitimate drama is not involved in a life interest with legitimate actors, and as we have a plentiful lack of them, or we might say a nearly total want of them, our fears are that the lady herself will not pay us a visit in our days. The performance terminated with the clever and graceful gymnastics of the Risleys. The father of the little prodigy is styled Professor! Certainly, every one who openly practises an art is entitled to whatever cognomen he may think proper to adopt, but Professor Risley and Professor Playfair are titles somewhat bordering upon the incompatible. But, though assumed in this instance, it is not so offensive as the title of Doctor conferred in many instances upon "witless and barren minds."

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

On Tuesday evening the "strength" of the company appeared.—No disparagement to Persiani or Miss Edwards Pavanti, but the "réunion de force" was brought forward for the first time this season on the night mentioned.—In fact, we may say that the season has only just commenced. Grisi, as Elvira in the "Puritani," was, if possible, more delicious than ever. Fornasari's return was warmly greeted; Mario was similarly welcomed, and the great Lablache was received with the most deserved enthusiasm.

To whom are we indebted for all this enjoyment? Certainly to the most liberal of all entrepreneurs who have conducted her Majesty's Theatre hitherto—Mr. Lumley. The annexed portrait, we hope, will be in some measure an atonement for one that was, through some accident or other, anything but felicitous on a former occasion, and inserted amongst our illustrations. We were sorry for the occurrence, and now hasten to amend it by giving another drawing of Mr. Lumley, which, although a second attempt, will be found to be more like an "original."

DRURY-LANE.

The custom of producing an Easter novelty in some shape or other, was dispensed with on last Monday at this house, in lieu of which we had the more rational gratification of hearing Duprez once more, whose congé has been extended to the present week. On Wednesday he performed the part of Ferdinand, in "The Favourite," on which occasion he was beneficiaire, and on Friday appeared for the last time as Arnold, in "Guillaume Tell." Certainly we have had no such acting singer on our stage before; and we trust that advantage will be taken of the lessons he has afforded in purity of style, and clearness and energy of declamation, in which qualities, although a Frenchman, he is immeasurably beyond every English vocalist with the exception of Braham.

LYCEUM.

This house of variable baptism was opened on last Monday night under the management of Mrs. Keeley, as the bills say. Female sovereigns have often proved successful in dramatic sway, and we trust that the present queen regnant of the Lyceum will have a long reign. Certainly her address was better concocted and delivered than certain other Queen's speeches, and was most heartily welcomed. It was written by Mr. G. à Beckett, and was as follows:—

When a new minister assumes the reins,
His policy 'tis right that he explains;
I, having taken office, don't refuse
To make the house acquainted with my views.
Some may conceive I owe an explanation
For having headed the administration:
Upon that point a motion I will make,
The opinion of the house at once to take,
That ladies can't good managers be reckoned.
Is that a motion any one will second [cheers]?
I thank the house for its polite decision,
The motion is thrown out without division.
To look on ldy ne'er could be my choice,
A woman always likes to have a voice;
Silent indifference could never suit her,
The grammar tells us woman can't be neuter.
'T.s true, I might have filled an humble station
In our theatrical administration;
But female influence soon gains the ascendant—
When it begins, no one can see the end on't.
Instead of coming to it by degrees,
I thought at once the Premiership I'd seize.
To keep the place I very much incline,
Unless this house calls on me to resign.
Now for the measures I shall introduce:—
I mean to do away with one abuse.
The scheme on innovation somewhat borders,
But I propose to drop the standing orders.
My policy may probably be hinted
In a short bill I've order'd to be printed;
That bill I see already in your hands—
I trust that you will pass it as it stands.
'Tis not the least remarkable of facts,
That if you pass that bill, you pass five acts;
If Parliament as fast could use its powers,
It wouldn't be complaining of late hours.
My views with brevity I now will state,
Upon the principle legitimate;
The drama call'd legitimate may thrive
As well in two or three acts as in five
Were length legitimacy's standard—then
What would become of all the little men?
Heirs to a throne, if short, would lose a crown,
Which must be given up—not handed down.
Man, by his mind, not by the height, we rate;
Talent, not length, makes plays legitimate.
But here am I, don't practice what I teach,
Making a long, and perhaps an empty, speech;
So, I'll be brief in coming to a close—
We've several measures ready to propose;
But if you deem them wrong, they shall be stopp'd—
Amendments we are anxious to adopt.
The confidence I feel there's one thing clenches—
As yet I see no opposition benches.
Before I bring my statement to an end
One thing must earnestly I recommend:
Throw out your bills, object, or criticise—
But never think of stopping the supplies.

The novelties of the opening night were "Hasty Conclusions," "The Post of Honour," and a new version or *per*version to the great diversion of every body present of "Ali Baba; or, the Forty Thieves," an engraving from which we shall present in our next number, the joint production of Messrs. G. à Beckett and Mark Lemon. Each of these gentlemen is a pun gent in himself; so what may we expect when "Greek meets Greek" and join their forces in the style, where one draws the bow and the other lets fly the shaft?

We cannot say much in praise of the two first pieces—they have not plot worthy of detail, nor dialogue that we can notice with approval. Keeley's acting and his charming little wife's personation of Morgiana (in which she gave an imitation, or rather iteration, an octave higher, of one of Duprez's hits in "Guillaume Tell,") delighted a thronged auditory. The season has commenced well, and we trust will continue to prosper.

RETRIBUTION.

BY THE

BARONESS DE CALABRELLA.

MR. NUGENT had intended but to go down to his seat for the check-book, and return without an hour's delay to London; but he found that a return of the fever by which his youngest daughter had some weeks before been brought to death's door, had again laid her on a sick bed, and the father could not leave her without seeing the physician, whose visit was not expected till late in the day. Mr. Thornton repeatedly reminded him that if they were in London by 10 o'clock on Monday morning, they would be in sufficient time, as till then nothing could be done. He took his seat by his suffering child, who had fallen asleep, and tears started in the fond father's eyes as he could now unobservingly dwell on those pallid features and note the thin and emaciated appearance of her hands, which were folded on her bosom.

His eldest daughter stole softly into the room, and whispered, "Papa, there is an express arrived from London. The messenger will only deliver the letter he brings to yourself. I will stay by Clara while you go to him."

Mr. Nugent carefully arose, but his step caused the sleeper to open her eyes, and her sister, who had heard that the messenger came from Mrs Hamilton, could not refrain from saying to herself, "how our precious Clara's sleep is troubled by that woman's importunity."

Mr. Nugent hastened to receive the letter from the hands of the messenger; on perceiving it to be in Mrs. Hamilton's hand writing, he thought "how like Stella thus to trouble herself to give me the comfort of hearing from her."

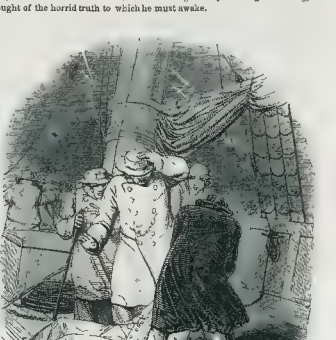
Ere he broke the seal, he gave the messenger the receipt he required for it, and then, turning into his library, he perceived Mr. Thornton close to him; for this gentleman had also heard of the messenger's arrival, and had his own reasons for watching the issue of this embassy. Mr. Nugent hurried past him, with the letter open, but had hardly reached the table, which stood in the centre of the room, when he reeled and fell senseless on the floor; his head, coming in contact with a projecting castor, was severely cut, and the blood streamed copiously down his cheek. Mr. Thornton rushed to him. His fall had been as though he had been shot. The letter, the fatal letter, had fallen from his grasp. Mr. Thornton picked it up, and his eye rapidly glanced over the following lines —

"Saturday Night.

"I am accused and under prosecution for the forgery which has been committed on your bankers; of which circumstance you are, I imagine, aware; but you are not, perhaps, prepared to hear me avow to you (but, remember, to you only, and in the firm conviction that you will not betray me), that I am guilty of it.

"S. H."

Mr. Thornton now used every endeavour to raise and remove Mr. Nugent. Fortunately, some water was at hand, and in about ten minutes he had the pleasure to perceive animation returning. Mr. Thornton was a gentle, a kind-hearted man; he had known Mr. Nugent many years, and could not but appreciate the sterling worth of his character. He had, like many of his friends, lamented the infatuation with which he had attached himself to Mrs. Hamilton, believing her to be quite unworthy of such an attachment; but, with all his dislike to her, he could hardly believe Mr. Spencer justified in his suspicion of her having been a party to this fraud. In his long and varied experience never had such an instance of barefaced ingratitude, of gratuitous crime, become known to him; and he shuddered as he beheld Mr. Nugent's eyes slowly unclosing, and thought of the horrid truth to which he must awake.



After reading Mrs. Hamilton's letter, he had put it in his pocket, which he was glad of, for he perceived that his friend's returning senses were evidently busy in search of something wherewith to establish or controvert reality.

Mr. Thornton bathed his face with water as he supported him on his arm; the blood continued to flow through the only compress he could find at hand; and wishing to give a direct motive for Mr. Nugent's state, rather than allow his mind to recall the real one, he said, "You have been ill, my dear Sir, our hurried journey has been too much for you, and I fear your anxiety about Miss Clara has made you forget your breakfast; and see" continued he "you must have cut your head when your foot caught in the carpet, and caused you to fall, for I found you bleeding profusely."

Mr. Nugent turned his head; his eyes were fixed on his friend with a look so intense, that it seemed as though life hung on the answer it should meet. With some difficulty and a convulsive grasp of his arm, he said, "Thornton, I adjure you to tell me what has happened; is my brain under the influence of some accursed fiend, or have I read words which have murdered reason?"

"We will talk of this by-and-by," said Mr. Thornton, "you are not able now; let me assist you to the sofa."

"No, no, my friend, it must be now; as you value my reason, answer me at once. Have I not had a letter from —— (he could not utter her name). Oh! in mercy tell me all."

Mr. Thornton took the letter from his pocket. Mr. Nugent held out his hand, but his whole frame was so violently agitated that he could not take it. He once more fixed his eyes on Mr. Thornton, and the sadness he beheld imprinted on the countenance of the latter seemed sufficient answer, for he buried his head in his hands and for a long while sobbed convulsively.

Mr. Thornton, glad of this turn in his grief, did not make any effort to disturb or arrest its course; and when Mr. Nugent again raised his head and spoke, his heart-broken tone assured Mr. Thornton that he was now quite alive to the hurried truth.

The physician in attendance on his daughter arrived, and being told that Mr Nugent had had a fall, by which he was a good deal shook, he bound up the cut in the head, administered a sedative, and recommended perfect quiet for some hours.

Overcome by mental fatigue, Mr. Nugent fell into a doze, during which time Mr. Thornton, while watching by him, endeavoured to consider what steps he ought to recommend, for he felt that some decision must be come to without loss of time, and he wished to spare Mr. Nugent the misery of discussing the different lines to be pursued.

When Mr. Nugent awoke he seemed weak, but quite composed. He put his hand out to Mr. Thornton, saying, "My friend, I feel I can trust you; you will never betray what has been, by my weakness, brought to your knowledge;" and perceiving Mr. Thornton's astonished look, he continued: "Do not misunderstand me—as much as I have loved that wretched woman, do I now loath and despise her; but for my own peace, and for the feelings of those who have known of my attachment, she must be saved from disgrace; and, by our old and long tried friendship do I implore you to aid me in accomplishing this end!

Mr. Thornton could not but be struck by the generous air, at the same time, the delicate, feelings of his friend, but it appeared to him positively impossible to achieve his purpose. "The business,' said he, "no longer rests with us; you have proclaimed certain signatures to be forgeries, and Messrs. C. and D. are bound to prosecute.'

"But surely not, if I make myself responsible for the sums drawn for in my name?'

"That would not exonerate them," replied the lawyer; "it would, I fear, be considered a compounding of felony."

"Then what must, what can, be done?" enquired Mr. Nugent. "Something must be imagined, some way must be found, to prevent this exposure."

"Alas! I can suggest nothing,' replied Mr. Thornton. "While the forgeries are in their possession, they are bound to seek out, and, if possible, bring the culprit to justice; and by their first proceeding being directed against her, there is little doubt but they are in possession of some strong evidence.'

"Then it is their retaining possession of those orders which obliges, or gives them power to prosecute," said Mr. Nugent.

"Assuredly," replied Mr. Thornton. "Without these proofs they could not substantiate a case."

Mr. Nugent remained silent for some time, and then begged his friend to leave him, as he would try to rest, to be able to start by the first train in the morning. "We must keep our appointment at Messrs. C——and D——'s," said he, "if only to prevent their suspecting that we possess any proof unknown to them."

At ten o'clock the following morning, Mr. Nugent, leaning on Mr. Thornton's arm, (for he was still feeble from loss of blood,) entered the parlour of Messrs. C——and D——'s banking house, where they found awaiting them the two elder partners. A few words passed respecting Mr. Nugent's accident, of which both he and Mr. Thornton evidently remained unaware that they had been incurred if Mr. Nugent had brought up his check-book, to which the latter replied, "Yes, and also a book, in which I have been in the habit of entering my receipts, payments, and daily disbursements. But so good,' said he, "as to give me all the orders, and I will go through them carefully, and mark those which tally with my check book: recollect, the other day I spoke from memory, and, perhaps, with some inaccuracy.

A clerk was ordered to place the orders before Mr. Nugent, who began to examine them with apparent anxiety and diligence. One of the partners was called away, and Mr Thornton remained conversing with the other, when, suddenly, Mr. Nugent sprang to the fire place, thrust the whole of the orders into the fire, and turning to the partner, who looked aghast, said, "The irresistible impulse which has induced this act, dictated by honour and friendship, will explain—that of bearing your house harmless, by giving you my bond for the amount of the vouchers I have destroyed."

The partners were much astonished by this termination of the affair; but whatever might be their own convictions, they forebore to distress Mr. Nugent by any expression of theirs. In a very short time the bond was prepared, and immediately after signed it. Mr. Nugent returned to his house and his children.

For some weeks Mrs. Hamilton refrained from writing or sending to Horace Vernon; her life was passed in watching for some token of his existence, till at length her agony of suspense became too great for endurance, and I, wrapped up in her maid's cloak, she proceeded one evening after nightfall to his lodging; for several minutes she was unable to knock at the door; her heart seemed within her when she thought how much of her peace or misery depended on the answer she might receive to her simple inquiry, "Is Mr. Vernon at home?" At length her hand raised the knocker, it rose, sound as it fell seemed to perish hope.

To the dreaded question, the reply was short and explicit: "Nobody knows where Mr. Vernon is gone. People think he has run away, and that's all that is known about him,' said a slovenly part of all work, in no good humour at having been disturbed in a comfortable game of cards with the groom of the first floor lodger, by this knock at the door. Mrs. Hamilton would have fallen to the ground but for a stout arm which was put forth on seeing her reel; the girl's scream brought the mistress to her assistance, and together they conveyed their insensible burthen to a sofa in the parlour. On recovering, Mrs Hamilton was told that Mr. Vernon had gone out one afternoon, after saying he should return to dinner, but had never been heard of since

"Can you recollect the day on which this occurred," faintly enquired Mrs. Hamilton

"Yes, sure I can;" replied the landlady, "for it was the very day my little Tommy cut his first tooth;" and taking from the work-box which stood open on the table, a pocket-book, she read aloud, "Tommy's first tooth—our lodger missing."

Alas! what a simple entry, how few words! and yet what extremes of feeling they embodied—the record of a young mother's first joy, the record of a less woman's betrayal; for Mrs. Hamilton well remembered that the date mentioned was the very day on which she had last seen Horace Vernon, and no longer could doubt that his not, and her child, had been his theme in conveying the pocket-book from her possession. Slowly she proceeded home, to a home which was now shunned by every individual she had formerly known. Mr. Nugent's generosity had preserved her from public disgrace, but the blow which he had so cured this had been bruited about, and their immediate and total cessation of intercourse readily suggested the cause which had induced it.

As long as Mrs. Hamilton cherished a hope that Horace Vernon was absent, merely from prudence, she found courage to repel various insults, which, in a thousand ways, assailed her; but from the time of his treachery being revealed, she gave herself up to despair.

About two months after the discovery of her guilt, Mr. Nugent received a letter from his banker's, expressing a hope that the sums for which the forgeries had been committed would be recovered on the 1st of April, when a bond fell due for the following circumstance. The captain of an American vessel had applied to the authorities at New York, for their advice respecting a large sum of money found on the person of a passenger, who had been careful enough to have a board during their voyage. It appeared that during a severe storm, he had been struck by a flash of lightning, which fluted him instantaneously, without leaving even the traces of a scorch on any part of his raiment.

The captain related, that this passenger, who called himself Henry Vinor, had come off in an open boat from Liverpool, after the vessel had sailed; that during the twelve days which preceded his death, he had made himself so agreeable and amiable, that the whole ship's company had regretted the individual, independent of the should cannot from his mysterious avocation—that in his pocket-book, which was found in an inner pocket of his coat, there were bank of England notes, to the amount of many thousands, several notes, signed S. H., addressed to Horace Vernon, Esq., and a few memorandums in the same inexplicable letter.

The authorities at New York, immediately sent over the numbers of the notes, with the foregoing particulars, to the secretary of the Bank of England, and by a reference to their books, these notes have been found to have been issued to our house, said this, added Messrs. C and D., we entertain great hopes of being shortly in possession of a very large portion of the embezzled property.

"Good Heavens!" exclaimed Mr. Nugent, on reading this letter, "am I to find treachery in all whom I have loved and trusted.' At first, his noble heart felt withered under the severity of these repeated blows, but the fond affection of his children at length produced a feeling of peace unknown from any other source. During his acquaintance with Mrs. Hamilton, his mind had been torn by contending feelings. Those were now at rest, and in the fulfilment of the many high duties imposed on him by his position and the undisturbed happiness of his children, his heart once more found peace.

The account of Horace Vernon's awful fate reached Mrs. Hamilton, while on a bed of sickness, from whence she never arose; she was attacked by the most frightful convulsions, delirium ensued, but at each interval of returning reason, she was heard to declare that the Retribution, though heavy, was just.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

THE CRAVEN WEEK AT NEWMARKET.

I set down what I thought pertinent to this business.—BACON.

Those who had the early management of racing at the metropolis of the turf, set about their business after a like philosophy. Having laid out such a line of four miles, as a sensible crow would fly, with occasion to pass over it once entirely to the other, they subdivided it into some fifteen courses, varying from two furlongs forty-seven yards (the Yearling Course), to the last three miles of the B. C. (three miles forty-five yards.) With the exception of the Round Course, used only for Royal Plates, all the racing at Newmarket is "straightforward," ci sic omnino. One never hears of a regular Hue and Cry robbery there; sometimes a bit of backsliding occurs—everybody is liable to a slip—but nothing like the sackings common to Doncaster for instance, ever come off.

The present season has opened full of like promise with its predecessors. The Craven week, which, as to its turf existence, ended yesterday, was a brilliant one so far as the weather influenced it, and a good average one in the items of company and sport; the latter may thus be epitomised:—As usual it opened with the Craven Stakes—on their present anniversary more interesting than they have been for many years. They were regarded as a trial for Rattan with Pineapple, for John Day with St. Lawrence, for Scott with Voltri, and for minor interests by means of Corasina. This capital horse won, splendidly ridden by James Robinson, with his rush on the post, a movement enough to put soul under the ribs of a dead turbite. Voltri ran as bad as a cow, and so put his backers out of their suppose at all events. Mr. Gully's Bay Middleton, Derby and Epsom within a few yards of the principal leap, which was a deep brook fifteen feet in the clear, with a foot-fence at the take-off. His Majesty alighted from his carriage, and intimated his tremendous leap, and then went to the carriage to witness the chase; the carriage afterwards left the ground, and the King, in his usual unostentatious manner, mixed with the company. Among the sporting gentlemen present we noticed Viscount Sandwich, Lord Chesham, Lord W. Wentworth, Col. C. A. Murray, Sir Charles Kent, Captain Buckley, Colonel Vyse, Lord Sheffield, Lord W. Beresford, A. Ricardo, Esq., and nearly the whole of the officers of the Life and Scots Fusilier Guards, &c. &c. The King of the Belgians returned to the Castle after the first chase.

The Hack Chase was run first, over the usual line of country. Nine horses started, viz.—Mr. Tennant's b g Circock, Mr. Chaloner's w h Magnesia, Mr. Day's ch g The Kicker, Mr. Henderson's ch m Maggy Lauder, Mr. P. Langton's gr g Monarch, Mr. H. Oldacre's ch g Terror, Mr. Williamson's br g Paddy, Mr. Sullivan's br g Skylark, Mr. Ward's g m Miss Fidget.

Cheroot took the lead and sustained it throughout, clearing all the fences and brooks in admirable style; Magnesia and Maggy Lauder were the first two which got into the second brook; Skylark cleared it, followed by Paddy, Miss Fidget, and another, got in the brook together; in coming round to the large brook, Cheroot was about two hundred yards ahead, followed by Miss Fidget, which cleared the brook; Skylark and Monarch, going close together. Terror fell, after clearing the brook; Magnesia ditto; Maggy looked at the brook, but would not face it. The Kicker did not make his appearance. The following three were passed, and the rest nowhere:—Mr. Tennant's b g Cheroot (Mason), Mr. P. Langton's gr g Monarch (Templeton), Mr. Sullivan's br g Skylarx (Carlin).

A very pretty match was afterwards run between Mr. Langley's b g Cardinal and Captain Thompson's b m Jessie's Mermaid, Cardinal carrying one stone extra. Mermaid took the lead to the first fence, which she refused. Cardinal took it up for some time, but was passed before coming to the great brook, which he got into. Mermaid cleared it, and kept the lead to the last brook, which they both cleared together, when there was a very pretty race to the finish, Cardinal winning by about twenty lengths.

The Heavy Military Steeple Chase was afterwards walked over by the Cardinal.

NOTTINGHAM SPRING MEETING.

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 10.

These races took place on Wednesday at Nottingham, when an immense concourse of spectators assembled together to witness the sports. The race-ground, which had been much improved since last year, was crowded with a highly respectable company, the races being got up, for the first time, instead of the usual annual steeple chase. The stewards were Thomas Wakefield, and William Hannay, Esquires, two magistrates of the town, and the sport throughout was excellent, the delightful weather affording full scope for enjoyment. The day was a general holiday in the town. The following is a return of the sport:—

GREAT FOOT HURDLE RACE.

The two greatest runners of the day (Jenkinson and Smith) contended in a race of three hundred yards on Wednesday, with fifteen hurdles, but, owing to the great assemblage of persons present and the extreme closeness of the race, it could not be fortunately timed. The contest was for £40, the ground selected being the Beehive, at Walworth; and long before the appointed hour some hundreds of sporting men, with a mixture of those who were finishing their holidays, were congregated. Both of the pedestrians are well known to the sporting public, Smith by the title of the "Regent-street Pet," and Jenkinson by that of the "Stag." They have before engaged together in a quarter of a mile contest, which resulted in a dead heat, and the friends of Smith, considering that he was superior to his opponent at three hundred yards, the present race was the result. Betting was 5 and 6 to 4 on the Stag. At a little after four the men came to the post, attended by their chosen friends and backers, and taking the inside place of nearly a circle, round which the hurdles were arranged. They effected a good start, and went off at a rattling pace, side by side, over the first three or four hurdles, when Jenkinson, who had closely waited upon by his opponent, who in turn took up the running. It was a great race, in which neither party could get away, and on coming to the last hurdle the men took it together, but it showed the slight difference of a head in favour of the Stag having it, and both reached the ground after the leap at the same instant. Both declared they had won: but the referee, whose great experience in these matters well qualified him for the post, declared that, owing to the proximity of the persons in the closeness of the struggle, it was impossible for him to determine who had touched the ground first, and that it must necessarily be considered a dead heat. In this opinion he was confirmed by the best judges and most unprejudiced persons on the ground. The stakes will accordingly be drawn.

HER MAJESTY'S STAGHOUNDS.—EASTER MONDAY.—Such splendid weather for the winding up of the season has not occurred within the memory of the oldest sportsman as was experienced on Monday last. The "meet" was consequently thronged not only by an unusual number of the "true sportsmen" and "Easter Monday genii," but by numerous equipages filled with ladies, whose presence much contributed to the brilliancy of this gay and animating scene. The deer Smuggler was uncarted in the middle of Stoke Common, and leaped over the hounds of several of the equestrians, knocking one person down. He then bore across the common to the left, made through a plantation, and over two or three fields, when the hounds came to a check of about twenty minutes. Of again getting on the scent they laid on the east hill, and burst across the country to Bulstrode Park; after leaving the park, circled about and returned, then leaped the park wall into the high road, and made for the woods; then away by Chalford St. Peter's, and was taken in a large wood about a mile distant from the town, after a run of two hours and forty minutes, the pace altogether not being first-rate. A large number were up at the take.

Her Majesty's stag-hounds met at Stony Cross, in the New Forest, on Wednesday. The road, from an early hour in the morning, assumed the appearance of bustle and animation; pedestrians, equestrians of every grade, and carriages, of every sort and description, rolling rapidly along, and in many places in one confused mass, to this celebrated and delightful spot celebrated as the identical place where King Rufus lost his life in the same pursuit, and where a stone is erected to mark the precise vicinage. It is a most beautiful spot, commanding most extensive views for miles round. It is computed that not less than 600 horsemen were on the ground, most of whom were scarlet. After the noble master of the hounds had arrived, the word was given to start, and shortly after, a noble stag and hind were found in a small piece of gorse at Pugpitts. The hind immediately dashed off at a rattling pace to Burley, where, after a smart run, she was killed. The greater part of the pack joined in pursuit, about three couple only taking after the stag, which also went off at a pace that soon made many of the nags, although of the first mettle, cry peccavi. The noble animal made to Bemley Copses, leaving Fritham to the right, and thence to Ivey, to the telegraph, which he neared, and went on to the Frenches, or Tinney's Priory, and again to Ivey, where he took refuge in a brook, and, after some little difficulty, was taken alive and safely housed. He is a noble fellow, of colossal size, and supposed to be one of the finest in the forest. The run altogether lasted one hour and forty-eight minutes, and at the time the stag entered the water, not more than twenty were up.

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE.—FRIDAY.—In to-day's market the number of wheat samples offering was by no means large, yet the demand for English qualities was extremely dull, at barely sustaining Monday's prices. Foreign wheat was offered in rather a more liberal supply, nearly a single transaction being reported in it. A large supply of foreign barley having been received, the trade was very dull and the inferior qualities gave way 2s per quarter. Malt, oats, beans, peas, and flour were unaltered.

Flour, America, 21s to 23s; Baltic, 21s to 23s, per barrel.

The Seed Market.—Linseed, rapeseed, and canary seeds have, in some instances, had a downward tendency; but the value of all other kinds of seeds have been held at full prices.

The following are the present rates:—Linseed, English, sowing, 50s to 56s. Baltic crushing 25s to 27 Mediterranean and Odessa, 24s to 25s; tempered, 25s to 25s per quarter; coriander, 15s to 20s per cwt.; brown mustard seed, 12s to 16s; white ditto, 10s to 12s taree, 6s to 6s 6d per bushel. Tea.—But little business has been doing in this market, yet prices are fully supported Several vessels have come in from China with full cargoes, and others are directly expected

Sugar.—There has been a steady demand for sugar, at rather more than previous rates Refined goods are firm, at 7s 6d for brown lumps

Coffee.—This market has a very dull appearance, and prices are falling. Good ordinary Ceylon has declined to 52s per cwt. By advices from Ceylon, we learn that very large shipments of the article have taken place.

Provisions.—Some large arrivals of foreign butter have again taken place, owing to which the demand for that article is very heavy, at a decline of 2s per cwt., the best Dutch being quoted at about 80s per cwt. Irish is very dull for sale, and nearly 2s per cwt. lower than last money. Bacon is very heavy at a reduction of from 1s to 2s per cwt. In other kinds of provisions comparatively little is doing. Prices are nearly as before.

Coke.—For all descriptions of oil the demand is brisk, and prices are generally on the advance.

Tallow.—This market is steady, and prices are supported. Those on the spot are 40s 9d to 41s, for forward delivery 42s per cwt.

Coals.—Adairs, 17s; Hetton, 17s; Old Pontop, 17s; West Wylam, 16s 11½d; Bewicks, 16s 9d; Kellingworth 16s; Stewart's, 22s 6d; Lambton's, 22s 6d; Hartley, 18s per ton.

Hops.—Our market is in a very sluggish state for most kinds of sorts, both in pockets and bags, yet we can notice no alteration in prices, which rule as under. Weald of Kent pockets 45s to 67s 6s. Mid Kent ditto, 46s 6s to 69 10s; East Kent ditto, 46s 6s to 69; Duto choice, 70s to 81l 10s; Sussex, 46s to 66s 10s; fine ditto, 68s 6s to 81l 10s; Mid Kent, bags, 45s 10s to 65s 10.

Wool.—The imports foreign and colonial wools since our last have amounted to about 16,000 packages. Privately, a fair business is doing, without any material alteration in prices.

Potatoes.—We have to report a steady demand for potatoes, at from 60s to 90s per ton.

Southfleet, at the same market, to-day, was moderately well supplied with beasts, yet the best trade was tolerably active, at full prices. In sheep, the supply was large, no fewer than eight hundred on offer from Spain, and 200 hogs from Aberdeen and Dundee. In sheep, the numbers of which were small a ready business was transacted, and the quotations had an upward tendency. The same trade was, on the whole, dull, as late rates From the Isle of Wight, fifteen beasts came to hand. Calves moved off slowly at barely stationary prices. Pigs were a mere drug, but not lower Milch cows were held at from £15 to £18 the each.

Per 8lbs.: to sink the offal.—Coarse and inferior beasts 2s 6d to 2s 8d; second quality do. 2s 8d to 2s 10d; prime large ozen, 3s 0d to 3s 4d; prime Scots, &c. 3s 6d to 3s 10d; coarse and inferior sheep, 2s 6d to 2s 8d., second quality ditto, 3s 10d to 3s 2d; prime coarse woolled sheep, 3s 4d to 3s 6d; prime Southdown sort in the wool, 4s 0d to 4s 4d; lambs out of the wool, 5s 4d to 5s 8d.; large coarse calves, 3s 4d to 4s 0d., prime small ditto, 4s 2d to 4s 6d., large hogs, 3s 2d to 3s 6d., small porkers, 3s 8d to 4s 0d., sucking pigs, 15s to 24s., each. COMMERCE AND MONEY.

If abundance of money and unbounded confidence in the ultimate security of national debts be marks of general prosperity, then England must certainly was never more flourish ng than it is at the present moment. From all appearances this continuon must be owing to the fact that manufactures districts general y, greater activ y has seldom existed, and the measures are paring fair rates of wages to their workmen. The demand for goods is unceasingly longer for our colonies and for our eastern empire; now, from the latest advices, it is probable that this demand can in any manner fal away during the remainder of this year at al events. To China, and to all foreign nations also, the exportat on of goods is on the rise, the rates of the foreign exchanges doing for the most part very fully prove that the value of our exports continues to exceed that of our imports. Gold, the silver, and bullion in England than in any other part of Europe, and the larger consequence must be a continued importation of it so long as our for-ign commerce remains in its present prosperous condition. Unemployed capital, consequently, in the interest is all our money markets; and on the Stock Exchange the Three per Cents Consols now command a premium of ¾ per cent, a circumstance which has not occurred for nearly one hundred years. In all other descriptions of British public securities there at present exists a upward by the same cause.

Bank and East India Stock and London Joint Stock Bank shares are all on the advance, and in the Fo eign Securities a progress-ve movement must be noted In this state of the English Stock Exchange our capitalists are turning their attention to railway investments, and important transactions in that description of property have been again entered into. These undertakings are truly national, for they give employment to many thousands of industrious people, and the raising value of landed property the income to a large amount from them, at their completion, will, in every probability, far exceed that to be obtained from the rents of land. In the money markets therefore, and to those who are only in search of safe infancy, a great dea. of business has been done during this week. The Chester and Holyhead, Lancaster and Carlisle, and North British lines are much thought of, and purchases of them cannot be made, unless at high premiums on the amounts already paid up. The shares of the Guiford Union some business has been again transacted in, their former prices Birmingham, and Edinburgh and Glasgow, are scarcely from one to two pounds a share dearer. Indeed, by reference to our quotations it will be seen that this description of property is gradually becoming more valuable, in proportion to the increase of investments in it

On the Foreign Stock Exchange, speculators have considerably increased their operations since our last quotations Spanish, in particular, have been sold and bought to a very considerable extent. The Thirees had been at 38¾ fell to 38½, and advanced again to 37⅞, at which the market closed, and the Active Stock at 19 to 19¼ Portuguese and Belgian Bonds are one per cent. lower, and a decline in those of Colombia to the extent of one and per cent since our last. Dutch, Peruvian, and Mexican securities remain as before, but the prices are fully supported, chiefly in consequence of the foreign demand, in which we alluded in our last, for the existing abundance of unemployed money is not confined to the United Kingdom. The money market here, on the whole, is at the moment remarkably easy, in a sound and healthy condition, nor is there any prospect of a speedy change occurring in it.

TWENTY YEARS' LOSS OF HAIR, AND WONDERFUL RESTORATION.—Extract of a letter, dated Dec. 31, 1841.—Gentlemen,—Of the last supply of OLDRIDGE'S BALM OF COLUMBIA, every bottle was sold before I got it as you accept, and I have many more bespoke, only waiting for a further supply which I hope you will send me. I send enclosed a Post-office order. Orders have poured in more than ever since the powerful effects of the Balm have been so decisively demonstrated in the cases of several public and respectable inhabitants of the town. One instance, that of a lady to whom I have attracted particular attention, is the case of a gentleman who had had little or no hair for twenty years; he had tried numerous preparations in vain, and ultimately had his head shaved, and wore a wig. At my recommendation he tried the Balm, and, according to the directions for a short time, the young hair appeared, and he has now as fine a head of hair as any person in Whitby.—I am, Gentlemen, your humble servant, JOHN KENDALL. Nesbaly, Brothers, 19, Westmoreland-buildings, Aldersgate-street London.—OLDRIDGE'S BALM preserves the hair turning grey, and in the first application causes it to curl beautifully, frees it from scurf, and stops it from falling off.—Price 3s. 6d., 6s., and 11s. per bottle.—Ask for Oldridge's Ba m of Columbia, 1, Wellington-street, Strand.

THE NATIONAL DEBT.

Many themes have we chosen, but never as yet
Have we written a word on the "Fundamental Debt."
And here, we confess, we've been in her remains;
For much ought to be said on a subject like this
Many persons have said that the "debt" thus incurr'd,
Can ne'er be defray'd, but we say the contrary word,
We humbly beg leave just to make a suggestion,
Whose adoption would answer the purpose in question.
Let the Government issue a Bill that shall Stand purchase the garments with which we have on hand;
And that out of each pound which the people have paid,
One farthing for Ministers' use shall remain.
That's the scheme we propose, and if persons reflect,
They'l find it would have the desir d effect.
The advantage of dealing w. h MOSES and SON,
Would in millions amount, when it once was known,
And the "Government farthing" deriv'd from each pound
Would pay many a debt, we should sound.
Politicians may prate, and boldly claim,
On removing the debt and relieving the state.
They may talk of Assessed Taxes, Taxes would do,
And descant on a "National Bankruptcy," too
But the Boon must be done before done,
By the novel proposal of MOSES and SON.

SPRING.—The prevalency of cutaneous visitations at this period of the year inculcates the necessity of preserving the Skin in a pure and healthy state, so that its functions may be performed. The high and universal celebrity which ROWLAND'S KALYDOR continues to maintain as an active yet mild and soothing eradicator of all impurities of the Skin, and promoter of Spring most pleasingly evinces. This preparation, eminently BALSAMIC, RESTORATIVE, and INVIGORATING, is equally celebrated for safety in application, as for unfailing efficacy in removing all roughness and discolouration, and in producing a healthy freshness and transparency to the skin and complexion. Its universally great demand excites the cupidity of unprincipled dealers, therefore ask for ROWLAND'S GENUINE KALYDOR to compounds of their own manufacture, of the most deleterious character, containing mineral astringents utterly ruinous to the complexion. To prevent the fatal effects of dangerous deceits, it is therefore necessary on purchasers to see that the words "ROWLAND'S KALYDOR," are on the wrapper—All others are FRAUDULENT COUNTERFEITS!!!

PUBLIC IMPROVEMENTS.

EVER glad to hear a financial rejoicing over the well-filled Exchequer, which the Income-tax has rescued from a state approaching bankruptcy, the people are beginning to think whether the State ought not to make them some return for their sacrifices. Five millions cut off the incomes and profits of a nation ought to have some acknowledgment, and no better one could be given, we think, than by infusing a little more alacrity into the spirit that is guiding the progress of what are called "Public Improvements." If any better way of spending the public money could be pointed out, we would not complain of the almost complete stoppage of this progress. But being in a position that enables us to pay our debts, and yet reserve a "contingent remainder," as surplus, we wish our rulers would look about them, and see if something could not be done towards completing the improvements of the Metropolis, that have been begun, and undertaking some others that have been long talked about. They need not look far, nor look long, without discovering an ample field for exertion.

Beginning with the seat and centre of the Government itself—there are the new Houses of Parliament, in progress, it is true, but, it seems to us, at a far slower rate than if they were being built by private enterprise, having at its command such funds as the Government possesses. They will form a noble pile, and there is, doubtless, a great deal to be done in raising it; but still very much may be accomplished in ten long years, if well employed: so long have these works been in operation, and some portions of the buildings are scarcely yet raised much above their foundations. But there is some hope of movements being quickened in future, for the House of Lords has lately shown symptoms of irritability at the continued delay, and in England there is always a prompt attention paid to the impatience of Peers. Lord Brougham will stir up their lordships, their lordships will put "the screw" on the House of Commons, the House will quicken the Treasury, and the Treasury will hasten the contractors; so by the current passing through the whole chain, an effect will be produced at the end of it, and such of the living generation as have attained the age of forty, may yet hope to see her Majesty open Parliament in the new houses of Legislature, before they reach threescore and ten. At one time this result did not seem probable, and that there is a better prospect of it at present we have, as Lord Brougham said on a memorable occasion, to thank Providence "that we have got a House of Lords."

But there are other people in the world besides Peers and Members of Parliament, who count in thousands for every individual either of the Upper or Lower House; their health, comfort, and convenience, to say nothing of what little taste they may happen to possess for the beautiful, one would think were worth some small consideration on the part of the State. Yet, sorry are we to say it, that the progress in improvements in which the people are concerned, is far more tardy in its pace even than that made in the case above-mentioned. From the "far west" we will turn "down east," and see what is doing there. We are almost afraid to state how many years ago it is since the plan for a park at Bethnal-green was proposed as a place for exercise, air, and recreation, to the smoke-enveloped and soot-discoloured denizens of the trading and manufacturing portion of this modern Babylon; larger, more crowded, and, we will undertake to say it, dirtier and uglier than the marvel of the olden world.

We believe more than ten years have elapsed since the plan was formed and adopted; the Board of Woods and Forests, of course had the management of the matter, and in its hands it has advanced like a Chancery suit—not a grain better, while it is impossible it could go on worse. Ten years have elapsed, and the Board has for that time stood the besieging of the press like Trojans; they have scarcely stirred an inch. The park is not made; the trees are unplanted; the groves and walks exist, like the streets of Boz's American city of Eden, only on paper; and the East-enders hear of it occasionally, but see it not, it being one of the things (alas! how numerous they are!) with which "man never is, but always to be blessed!" Another great plan has just been broached; it is proposed to make an embankment on both sides of the Thames, to the great increase of the beauty of the metropolis, and the convenience of its intercourse; let us guess, by the progress of the eastern Park, the probability of seeing the completion of the western Embankment. Its terraced walk may be perhaps first trodden by the grandchild of the youngest of our readers.

Those who have fortunately nothing to do but to watch what is facetiously called the "progress" of the improvements of the city—an occupation that at the past and present rate bids fair to engage them for their entire lives, even if they were prolonged to the term of that of Methuselah—cannot but have remarked in several quarters the marks of energies speedily exhausted. Violent hands have been laid on whole streets, and they have been demolished. But at this point activity ceases; the constructive and finishing faculty seems wholly wanting, or at best a part of a street is built, as a roadway to—nowhere; such an example is afforded in that new fragment of a line which continues Farringdon-street on to the kennel of West-street, and there stops; from the roadway the curious explorer gets a very advantageous view of the back of the free-trading colony of Field-lane. At present the line possesses no other visible utility or recommendation, and it has been in nearly the same state these three years past. We could mention other places in the district of Bloomsbury that are suffering under this suspension of efforts too successfully began, but the worst and most glaring instance of all, is the state of Trafalgar-square. For year after year have the eyes of the public been outraged by the unsightly hoardings that occupy the whole of the finest site in the metropolis, for the special benefit, as it would seem, of the bill-stickers. The Nelson pillar was slowly raised, and the other additions that are required to complete the works do not promise much more speed; the state of this—the most public place in the city—is a disgrace both to the nation and the Government. It is from such things as these, that foreigners judge us; and, looking at the manner in which our public improvements are conducted, we can hardly wonder that in this respect we are the mockery of Europe.

Now we are firmly convinced that there is no substantial reason for all this discreditable management, carried on with continual delays and ending often in total failure. The Government has the power to do better, were it possessed of the will. No one who has seen the manner in which millions on millions of the public money is voted away in the course of a few hours in the House of Commons, for purposes of which the public know nothing and see no results, can for a moment suppose that it would grudge the few thousands that would alone be necessary to begin what is necessary, and to complete what has been begun, when the improvement and advantage might be seen and shared in by all. If jobbing were avoided, and a real, earnest intention shown of procuring the public money's worth for its money, not even Mr. Hume would complain of the expenditure. It is with no wish to emulate the extravagance of Louis the Fourteenth, or the arbitrary arrogance of Napoleon, that we wish our rulers would adopt something of the principle on which they both proceeded in their public works, which have made France the centre of attraction to the whole of Europe. A little energy, a little rousing from the indifference and apathy which in England seem to be the infection of office, and these complaints would be remedied. The people, seeing year after year go by, without any visible care or effort for what lies before them in their daily life, are wearied out even of hope, and grow as indifferent as their rulers; hence the carelessness of taste, and want of appreciation of anything within the domain of the arts, which are the characteristics of barbarism. Seeing that the Government receives all and refunds nothing in the shape of public works, or does the little it undertakes in the most niggardly spirit, the people look on the Executive as a mere machine for taxing them—obey it because such is the law—but exhibit neither reverence nor affection for it, since nothing has been done to excite either of these feelings.

"LOTTERY," THE CELEBRATED STEEPLE-CHASE WINNER. DRAWN BY HERRING.

"LOTTERY," THE CELEBRATED STEEPLE-CHASE WINNER.

The prefixed portrait of "Lottery," has been drawn by Mr. Herring, whose equine sketches are equally admired for their characteristic spirit and fidelity of detail.

"Lottery" is the most extraordinary gelding of his day. He was bred by Mr. Jackson, of Whitecross, near Beverley, Yorkshire; from whom he was purchased by his present proprietor, Mr. E. Jones. He is of the same breed with Welbeck and Grog, not thorough; 16, hands high; colour brown, without white. The sire of this remarkable nag was one of the fleetest and most powerful racers that ever appeared on the courses. "Lottery," in addition to his excellency in ten flag races, he has not been known to refuse a fence, nor put a foot in a grip: in short, he is described as "the most generous animal in the world;" he is about 18 years old. His quality is of the very first order; he takes his fences temperately; and, after clearing a jump, drops into his step, goes in a very good form, and manifests superior sound. He is a complete snaffle bridle horse; and the circumstance of his being uniformly ridden with a snaffle, indicates the delicacy of his mouth.

Although "Lottery" is not thorough-bred, yet he presents the genuine characteristics in a manner that would lead the juvenile astray, were it not for his well authenticated pedigree; he possesses the legitimate perseverance, and can go the pace: if, therefore, we consider "Lottery" to approach within a trifle of acknowledged thorough-bred, we may be said to form a striking proof of the erroneousness of that doctrine (now nearly exploded), which denies to such nags the gift of leaping.

"Lottery" is a horse that well repays the scrutiny of examination: he fills the eye of the beholder; he has the requisite depth of chest, the well-placed oblique shoulder, with all that posterior development, whence the propelling power must necessarily originate.

"Lottery" was the winner of the Liverpool and Cheltenham steeple chases, in 1839; besides several other chases. His latest triumph was at the Windsor steeple chase, on Tuesday week, where he was, indeed, a "clever winner." He was ridden by Mason, in his usual good style.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

(From our own Correspondent.)

Paris, April 16.

SPAIN.

"The firmness of Bravo and Narvaez," observed a French member yesterday to a foreign diplomatist, "has not only restored order in Spain, but placed its revenue in a state of progress pour ainsi dire." "Permit me to offer you my congratulations," was the sarcastic reply of the Ambassador, who retired with a smile of incredulity. The Count d'A—— is much better informed of the real position of Spain than M. Guizot; he is aware that the interior of the kingdom is greatly agitated, and that the present calm is the forerunner of a serious convulsion. But Europe be not deceived by the profusion in the exchange of decorations usually given at the conclusion of a treaty, or the signing of a peace; the honour of the Golden Fleece bestowed on M. Guizot, and the Grand Cross of Charles III. on Count Bresson, are for services rendered and services expected; the Grand Cross of the Legion of Honour now adorns the breasts of Narvaez and Bravo are payments - not the rewards of merit. The French ministry have undertaken to support Narvaez coute qui coute—Narvaez has promised to destroy British influence and that Count of Montemolin, the present moment. The immoral compact will not succeed Spaniards have good memories; they do not forget the Orleans demonstrations at Barcelona and Cadiz!! Queen Christina is an influential ally of France; Isabella II. has been strongly attached to England; to direct the attention of the Baby Queen from State affairs, Narvaez, on the 9th, presented her, in the name of the army, with an enormous bouquet in sugar, of large a dimension that it required sixteen grenadiers to carry it on their shoulders. The bouquet represented a fortress, probably Alicant or Carthagena, with its forts—something like those round Par—towers, drawbridges, sentries, &c. &c. Isabella, on receiving it, shed tears, not of sorrow, for the death of her former preceptor, whose funeral was actually passing through the streets, but of joy, and immediately called for her sister, to examine the interesting present of her faithful defenders! Poor Isabella—poor Spain, whose destinies are purchased with a sugar fortress!! But is Spain tranquil? Decidedly not. The Maestrazzo is overrun with Carlist insurgents; and notwithstanding the report published by the Government, that on the 28th and 29th of last month the insurgents were defeated near the village of Bordon, and had eight men killed, I can state in a manner the most positive, that their numbers daily increase; that they are masters of the mountains; and that, unless the most vigorous measures be immediately adopted, all the Carlists in Catalonia and the Basque Provinces will rise against the Government. A respectable demonstration would greatly embarrass the Government at the present moment, for, without degrading themselves in the eyes of the world, they must carry out their threat against the Emperor of Morocco; my private information assures me that the expedition has been determined on, and that orders have been given to the Captain-Generals of the southern provinces to provide a certain number of troops, to be sent to Santa Maria. I have, however, great doubts of the sailing of the expedition, the interior of Spain requiring all the force Narvaez can bring in the field.

Ministers are in a dilemma as regards the imprisonment of the Opposition deputies; it is said that Guizot intends to set M. Cormin at liberty, and to send M. Madon on his trial, as being connected with the Alicant insurrection; and that should he be found guilty, to give him the benefit of an amnesty. The muzzling of the press has been proposed to the Council, but numerous measures adopted to destroy it altogether. It is intended, on the first condemnation, to fine the editor in a sum not less than 80,000 reals, and twelve months imprisonment, and on the second offence to prohibit the publication of the paper.

Amongst other decorations lately given by the French Government are the Grand Cross of the Legion of Honour to Castagnos, and the Cross of Commandeur to M. Benavides, political Chief of Madrid, and M. Arana, Master of the Ceremonies.

A most frightful accident occurred on the 31st of March, at Felanits, in the Balearic Islands, on the occasion of the procession of Palm Sunday. A great concourse of people had assembled in the old burial-ground, in the front of the church of Santa Rosa, to hear a sermon. At the moment when the preacher was commencing, a wall, near which the crowd was standing, fell down, and more than 600 persons were buried in its ruins; of these were killed 247 men, and 152 women, and 199 wounded, the greater part mortally. Amongst the dead men were the Alcalde and six members of the Municipal Council, who were only that day installed in office, and the clergyman. Felanits has 10,000 inhabitants.

The Marquis de Vilanis, the Ambassador named to the Court of Naples, has quitted Madrid for Italy.

ITALY.

Owing to the severity of the Censor, and all letters being opened at the Post-office, we are without news to-day but of any thing that is going on of a political nature in Italy. All I can learn is, that the roads are infested with robbers, and that at the end of last month two diligences were attacked by banditti on the road from Naples to Rome. The passengers were robbed, but not otherwise ill-treated. A letter from Rome of the 29th ult. gives as certain, that in consequence of the recent attempt at outbreak in Calabria, and the intrigues of the Italian malcontents, the Italian Governments are about to enter into a sort of federation for their mutual support and assistance.

It is generally reported that the King of Sardinia has accepted the mediation of France and England in its dispute with the Bey of Tunis.

The negotiations for a marriage between the Duke de Bordeaux and the Princess Maria Carolina of Naples are so far advanced, that their union is now beyond all doubt. The illness of the Duke d'Angoulême is the only cause for delaying the nuptials.

The two sons of Admiral Bandiera have quitted Corfu for Malta, where Maxwell, the chief of Young Italy, was expected from England.

The King of Naples has appointed a commission of 22 members to collect and prepare for publication all the remarkable unpublished manuscripts connected with the history of the territories, which are to be met with in either the public or private libraries. It is supposed that the labours of the committee, owing to the immense number of manuscripts, will last for 12 to 15 years.

GERMANY.

The King of Bavaria has published a decree, in virtue of which Protestant soldiers are to be no longer forced to be present at the service of the Roman Catholic Church, or Catholic soldiers to attend on the occasion of religious ceremonies in Protestant Churches.

Field Marshal Prince Frederick Francis Xavier of Hohenzollern-Hechingen, Governor-General of Illyria, and Honorary President of the Aulic Council of War of Austria, died at Vienna on the 6th, aged 67 years. The Prince served 60 years in the Austrian army.

The sale or publication of the "Mysteries of Paris" has been prohibited in the Austrian States, either by the Government or Censorship.

Letters from Gorits to the 3rd, state that the Duke d'Angoulême had experienced a new fever, but less severe than the last.

FRANCE.

The Tahiti affair and the Polka engrosses all the attention of the Parisian public. The Deputies have resolved that Admiral Dupetit-Thours is a Napoleon, and that M. Guizot ought to be impeached; they, however, content themselves for the present with burning the Government with repeated questions. The Opposition Press is labouring hard to raise a hatred to England. In one of these journals, the Presse, the editor makes the following remarks:—"England," he observes, "must inevitably meet with her Waterloo; with this difference, that the great battle will not be fought in a small village, but on the wide ocean. It was in the name of their wounded independence that the nations coalesced against France; it will be in the name of their restricted commerce and industry that they will re-unite against Great Britain. The fleets will be gathered together as their armies have been. There will be no difference, except in the common enemy. Every conquest by which the trade and commerce of the Continent is enriched, hastens the day when British pride will be brought inevitably to its extremity. This pride, a Cabinet directed by a statesman of the ability and prudence of Sir Robert Peel, may endeavour to cloak under deceitful outside appearances; but beyond its official speeches, and its diplomatic communications, it cannot restrain itself, but is betrayed on every occasion. To give a just idea of the haughty spirit of Great Britain, it is necessary to see an English naval officer on board his own ship, and at a distance from home. The farther he goes from it, the more his pride increases. It is not in Europe, but in some distant sea, that the maritime coalition with which Britain is threatened will have birth, and which will be the salvation of the trade and commerce of the Continent." It is with such nonsense that the press endeavours to inflame the minds of the French. The members of the Opposition majority allow the Opposition to brawl and splutter, and their only reply to the accusation of their misgovernment, is the publication of an official table of the receipts of Indirect Taxes, months after the present year, which as compared with the same period of 1843, shows an increase of 1,507,000 francs.

The Minister of Public Instruction has determined on sending out Dr. Alfred Dumeryay on a new scientific mission. He is to visit the southern provinces of Brazil, some of which have never yet been explored by Europeans, to study their natural, physical, and moral history. He is to endeavour to penetrate into the horrible and mysterious provinces of Chaco, whose frontiers have been reached by M. D'Orbigny, without his being able to pass their boundaries, which hitherto have been insurmountable on account of the ferocity of the inhabitants, who are all anthropophagi of remarkable stature.

The obsequies of Prince Galitzin took place on Thursday last in the Russian chapel. During the preceding night priests were constantly reciting prayers for the dead. At eleven in the morning, the mourners were assembled, further prayers were recited, and the priests strewed salt and earth over the corpse, and all who belonged to the Greek Church kissed the hands of the deceased. A great many persons of distinction attended the ceremony, amongst others the Russian Chargé d'Affaires and Lord Cowley. The body is to be conveyed to St. Petersburgh and afterwards to Moscow.

Nothing fresh in either the musical or theatrical world. Duprez has returned from London, and will appear for the first time on Friday next in "Don Sebastian." Thalberg is expected on the 19th. A Spanish opera, by Bazil, called "The Smugglers of Sainte Marcre," will be performed at the Italian Opera, the end of the month. The principal performers are Messrs. Ojeda, Salas, and Mesdames Amigo and Catala.

GREECE.

On the 30th ult. the address of his Majesty King King Otho, on the closing of the Assembly, was delivered by himself as follows:—

"Messieurs les Députés, I am happy to see the great work of the constitutional charter of Greece brought to a close, and I present myself before you, in order to seal it by the present oaths. I desire that the Constitution, that sacred and indispensable law of the country, may produce all the good it may produce and consolidate the prosperity of Greece. The task for which I have convoked the National Assembly being finished, I declare it to be closed."

The capital was illuminated in the evening.

AMERICA.

Arrival of the Roscius and Caledonia.—The fine packet-ship Roscius arrived at Liverpool on Sunday, from New York on the 26th ult., and was followed by the Caledonia, mail-steamer, next day, bringing Boston papers to the 1st inst. and New York to the 30th ult.

There is little of interest in the papers, independance of speculation, in the papers which have come to hand. Jonathan is fond of excitement, and the subjects which at present tickle his fancy and engross his thoughts relate to the annexation of Texas and the Oregon territory.

The few paragraphs which possibly may be of interest to our readers will be found below, but, on the whole, the papers before us are exceedingly devoid of interest.

Congress is expected to adjourn about the middle or the latter end of May. Fires, some of them extensive, had taken place in New York, where a church was burnt; at Boston; in the neighbouring state of New Jersey, where a factory was destroyed; at Baltimore, and other places. The Missisipi had been the scene of another steam-boat collision, the fatality of which, however, unlike most other calamities of a similar description in America, had not been very great —one poor fellow was killed, and a number dreadfully scalded.

Colonel Cunningham and Mr. M'Gowen fought a duel at Hamburg, South Carolina, the latter killed. A lamentable duel took place in the Richmond railroad, on the 23d, killing three persons, and wounding several. A duel was fought at Decatur, Mississippi, between Mr. J. A. Adams and Mr. N. B. Johnston, the former killed. A duel on the same day, at Vicksburg, Mississippi, Mr. Rogers was assassinated in the street, by some person unknown.

James Gates, mate of the ship Oxford, from Liverpool, has been sentenced at New York, to be imprisoned for thirty days, and fined 2,000 dollars, for smuggling.

A great repeal meeting had been held at Philadelphia, the verdict against Mr. O'Connell being the text from which all the speeches were made. 400 dollars were contributed, and a resolution was passed to remit £200 to Ireland. In New York there was a similar demonstration, but more violent in its character, as one of the resolutions appointed May 1 as the day upon which the jury that sat on Mr. O'Connell are "to be hung in effigy." Some of the subscriptions (25s each) are in all) were handed in with "money to buy rope for the jurors."

In Canada a lamentable accident had occurred, produced by the falling of a fowling-piece, loaded with shot, by the careless movement of which lodged in the breast of a Mrs. Rose, killing herself and an infant which she had in her arms. A clerk in an auction mart, at Brooklyn, near the city of New York, on the opposite shore, had been assaulted, with a cavalry-sabre, by a man named Miller. The fellow was immediately seized, and conveyed to prison.—General Porter, who had filled some high offices in the State Legislatures, had died at his residence, Niagara Falls, in his 71st year. Advices had been received from Buenos Ayres, twenty days in advance of the previous news, but nothing is stated, except that the war between that Republic and Buenos Ayres was still in statu quo, and nothing had occurred to alter the general aspect of things.

We learn from a second edition of the Montreal Gazette of the 27th of March that the residence of the Governor-General will be ready for his reception on the 1st of June, and that on the removal of the provincial government will take place about a fortnight earlier. Mr. Barnard, the Opposition candidate for Herbert, late partner with Mr. Drummond, is appointed Solicitor-General; an appointment which, we are sorry to perceive, does not give much satisfaction. It is understood to be due to the influence of Mr. Viger. The writ for the election of Montreal had a fourth time gone back, Mr. Delisle being disqualified. The Irish were very generally opposing the Constitutional candidates, getting up nightly meetings, where they were addressed in very inflammatory terms.

Mexico.—By an arrival at New Orleans, we have Vera Cruz dates up to the 11th inst., and from the city of Mexico to the 7th.

All was quiet in the interior of the country, but those well versed in Mexican affairs think that Santa Anna is hatching some plan at Manga de Clavo for the overthrow of the present Congress, does not give much satisfaction.

Business is said to be extremely dull in Mexico, with little prospect of improvement.

Joseph Greenham, formerly of New York, but for many years a distinguished merchant of Vera Cruz, died at that city on the 6th inst. He was the owner of some ten or twelve cotton factories in Mexico, and supposed to be worth five millions of dollars.

Mr. Bankhead, the British Minister, arrived on the 10th inst. at Vera Cruz.

An express arrived from Mexico on the 7th inst., from the French Minister, with despatches for the commander of the Brilliante, the purport of which, it is said, is to request him to delay his projected departure, and to assemble his forces now in the Gulf at Vera Cruz. All eyes at the latter place were turned toward the British Minister, post arrived; for it was thought that, on his arrival at the city of Mexico, there would be a meeting of the Foreign Ministers, and decided steps taken in relation to the recent decrees.

Revolution in Hayti.—Advices have been received at the Exchange News Room, by the brig Eagle, from Cape Haytien, to the 14th of March, that the disturbances in the island had assumed a serious aspect. The whole of the national army and all the National Guards (militia) were under orders to march against the insurgents. The President was collecting all the effective force in that part of the island, and it was thought there would be some fighting, but that the revolution would probably be suppressed without much difficulty.

THE BRAZILS.

The Linnet, from Rio de Janeiro, brings a confirmation of the change in the Brazilian Ministry, as likewise of an accession thereto of two gentlemen, one well known in this country, Mr. Galvao, formerly Minister of Brazils at this court, and now a senator for the province of Bahia, and General Andrea, who acquired great fame by his prompt putting down the disturbances a few years since in the provinces of Para, Maranham, and St. Catherins, the former as Minister of Justice, and the latter of the War Department. The resignation of the late ministry was occasioned by their wishes not being complied with as to the dismissal of the chief of the Custom-house, Mr. Olveira, who had opposed them in the election of a senator for the province of Rio de Janeiro. The Linnet is the bearer of a large sum on the Brazilian Government account.

Her Majesty's ships at Rio were the Crescent, Pearl, Penguin; the Dutch ship Boreas; American ships Chipola, Columbus, and Congress; and French ship Résolue remained there. The Daphne was at Santos to relieve the Pearl.

The latest intelligence from Buenos Ayres was the 1st of February, and Montevideo the 8th. Rosas was unwell; he was reported to be the gout. Orbe continued before Montevideo, which place was still holding out.

CHINA.

The general feeling in China appears to be that the Chinese are sincerely intent on fulfilling their engagement with the British nation; yet one of our correspondents writes, that they are evidently preparing for the contingency of war. In the direction of Whampoa platoon and file firing may be heard every morning, which not only illustrates the report of large bodies of troops being at daily exercise, but likewise indicates that his Celestial Majesty is becoming sensible of the advantages of European discipline. We have no right to quarrel with any people for improving their means of defence; and, in the case of the Chinese, we are rather inclined to hail the circumstance as a happy presage—a prognostic, in short, of further advancement in civilisation, by the adoption of the arts and sciences of Europe. Now that the ruinous coalition with which Britain is threatened will have birth, and which will be the salvation of the trade and commerce of the Continent." It is with such nonsense that the press endeavours to inflame the minds of the French. The members of the majority allow the Opposition to brawl and splutter, and their only reply to the accusation of their misgovernment, is the publication of an official table of the receipts of Indirect Taxes, months after the present year, which as compared with the same period of 1843, shows an increase of 1,507,000 francs.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—Monday.

The house re-assembled for the first time on Monday night, after the Easter recess. New writs were moved for Huntingdon, Exeter, and Woodstock, in the room of Sir F. Pollock, promoted to the Chief Baronship of the Exchequer; Sir W. Follett, transferred from the office of Solicitor-General to that of Attorney-General; and Mr. Thesiger, appointed Solicitor-General.

Mr. Wyse asked that the second reading of the Irish Franchise and Registration Bill, which was fixed for Friday next, should be postponed for a fortnight, in order to give the Irish members and their constituences fuller time for its consideration.—Sir R. Peel was strongly opposed to postponements, as it wasted the earlier period of the session, and three important measures over till the close, when they either received hasty consideration, or were abandoned. But, in order to evince his desire that full time should be given for the consideration of this measure, he consented to the postponement of the second reading from Friday next till a future day, of which notice will be given.

On the motion that the house should go into Committee of Supply, Mr. M. Linton called attention to a petition from Manchester presented on the 1st of April last, complaining of inconveniences endured by the mercantile community of that town from the Post-office arrangements.—Sir G. Clerk stated that the Post-office authorities were desirous to remove the grievances complained of, but were impeded by obstacles in their arrangements with the railway companies.—Mr. M. Philips, Dr. Bowring, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer added some observations on the subject, the latter stating that Manchester, with a little patience, may ultimately obtain what it wanted, without compelling the Government to submit to the exorbitant terms demanded by the railway companies.—Sir. R. Peel added, that the whole subject would be fully opened in the house on any occasion by showing a disposition to give every facility, on fair terms, for the conveyance of letters. The subject, after some further conversation, dropped.

Mr. W. Ingles asked if the Government were contemplating any measure on the subject of parochial assessments.—Sir James Graham replied that the intended amendments of the Poor-law, especially on the law of settlement, would necessarily involve, as a consequence, an amendment of the law relative to parochial assessment. If, therefore, at some future time, he had the honour to fill the situation he now occupied, it would be his duty to submit such a measure to the house.

The house then resolved into Committee of Supply, various items of which gave rise to discussion. On the vote being moved of £59,350, for the expenses of the two houses, salaries, &c., Mr. Hume moved to decrease it by £5,000, as Lord Lyndhurst gave no particulars of the manner thereof. Some conversation took place upon the prisons at Pentonville and Parkhurst, after which the vote was agreed to. Other votes were adopted.

On the motion of Sir James Graham, the County Courts Bill was read a second time, and ordered to be committed on Friday.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—Tuesday.

The House of Peers resumed its sittings on Tuesday, for the first time after the recess.

Lord Cottenham postponed the second reading of the Debtor and Creditors' Bill to Monday next, at the request of the Lord Chancellor.

On the motion of Lord Monteagle, the Forestalling &c., Offences (Ireland) Bill was read a second time.

Their lordships adjourned to Thursday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—Tuesday.

The Speaker took the chair at the usual hour.

Mr. F. Scrope gave notice that on the 30th instant, for leave to bring in a Bill to regulate the Admin.stration of Oaths in the Scottish Universities.

Mr. Thornely gave notice, for the same day, on the part of Mr. Cobden, to move for a committee to inquire into the effect of protective duties upon the national revenues.

In reply to Dr. Bowring, Mr. Gladstone stated that the consideration of some points of detail only remained between the Government from bringing forward their measure for the regulation of the import duties of the Isle of Man.

In answer to Mr. W. O. Stanley, Sir J. Graham stated that he had taken measures for obtaining a correct estimate of the value of the Court of Request in Birmingham changed; so that it was now regulated in a manner satisfactory to the Mayor and Recorder of the borough.

Mr. Wyse moved for a return of the names, offices, places of birth, salaries, and ages of all persons holding offices in the Customs, Excise, and Post-office departments of the United Kingdom, with the dates of their appointment, and present location, his object being to show that Ireland had not a fair share of official patronage.—Sir Robert Peel decidedly objected to the production of these voluminous returns. It was objected to by Mr. Wyse, that the Postmaster-General in Ireland was an Irishman, and that the Postmaster-General in Scotland was an Irishman. So, also, the head of the Irish police was said not to be an Irishman; but the very last time he (Sir Robert Peel) had appointments connected with the police force in England to dispose of, they were, two in number, conferred on Irishmen. Look to the united service; Sir Hugh Gough, lately appointed Commander-in-chief in India, was an Irishman. As to the return called for, there were no less than 27,000 individuals connected with the public departments, the individuals were English, Scotch, or Irish, but who was the most interest.—After a few words from Mr. Warburton and others, the motion was negatived without a division.

Mr. Wyse again moved, and agreed for a return of the amount of Irish income which is assessed to the property tax in Great Britain, distinguishing the amount charged under each schedule; but he withdrew it, on the intimation, by Sir R. Peel, that there were no official means of granting it.

Mr. Alderman Copeland next moved for various returns connected with the working of the anatomy act, which he considered to have been injurious in its operation.—Sir J. Graham said that he had supported the anatomy bill when it was passing through Parliament, and all his experience of its operation convinced him it was a wise measure. The schools of anatomy were under the provisions of that act well supplied with subjects without that violation of the sanctity of the dead which formerly existed. There had been some irregularities it was true, but there were simple means of checking them. Under these circumstances he hoped the house would support him in refusing the returns.—After a short discussion the motion was withdrawn.

Mr. Hume then moved a resolution, to the effect that the exemplary conduct of the people, during the exhibition of the cartoons last year, warranted the house in agreeing to the recommendation of the select committee of the house on national monuments in 1841, for throwing open the larger portions of Westminster Abbey, St. Paul's, and other cathedrals throughout the country, to the public daily, and especially on Sundays, reconciling such free admission with the due and undisturbed performance of religious service.—Mr. Wyse seconded the motion.—Sir R. Inglis said he could not agree that sight-seeing in cathedrals was a proper means of increasing the spirit of devotion amongst the people, nor could he feel otherwise than that the most effectual means to attain this object by, and even of such fine statues as those of Chantrey and Watts, was quite incongruous with the sacred character of our cathedrals. He was opposed to the motion.—Mr. M. Milnes objected to the receipt of fees at the doors of cathedrals, as a gross profanation of the high purposes for which they were erected.—Sir R. Peel adhered to the opinions which he had heretofore frequently given upon similar motions to the present. He thought that nothing but benefit could flow from giving a free access to all the institutions of the country, and he believed such free access might be extended, with perfect safety, to the works of art, with very ordinary precautions. Still, he must object to attain this object by the indirect means of a resolution of the house, which might give rise to feelings militating against the object in view. The resolution was indefinite, and when such feelings were excited, the disposition to carry out certain topics of law

KASGEEWHALA, THE GWALIOR USURPER.

Our readers will recollect the surrender of this influential personage in the recent accounts of the capture of Gwalior; and the interest attached to his career has induced us to obtain for our readers the annexed native portrait, with the accompanying details from a correspondent thoroughly conversant with Indian affairs, and the state and prospects of the British interests.

The Dada Kasgeewhala is, or rather was, the most powerful of the Mahratta chiefs under the Gwalior rule, and from his having usurped the supreme power, and interposed his authority between the British Government and the Maharanee, he has been brought a prisoner within the British territories, and will be detained for life. A singular fate appears to have attached itself to the successors of rulers over the Gwalior state; the three last sovereigns having died without leaving an heir male, and thus the succession to the throne having been by adoption. Madhajee Scindia had no son, and his only daughter, the Bala Baee, had no son; the Queen Dowager, therefore, on the decease of Madhajee, adopted him; he was afterwards known as the great Dowlaet Rao Scindiah, who, after subjecting all the North Western Provinces of India to his rule, was obliged in his turn to give way to British arms, and by the treaty of Boorhampoore, he agreed to dismiss all the French officers then in his service, never to retain any others, to acknowledge the British as the sovereigns, and hold true and good faith with them in all things. In 1830 he died, leaving no male issue, and his widow, the Baizee Baee, adopted a boy, who ascended the throne under the title of the Maharaja Jhunkojee Rao Scindiah, the Baizee Baee acting as Regent. The young Rajah, however, soon quarrelled with his adopted mother, and expelled her from the State, and she has since resided in the Company's provinces. In 1843, Jhunkojee Rao died also without male issue, and it then became necessary for his widow, a girl only thirteen years of age, to name an adopted son, and she selected Jyajee Rao Scindiah, the next of kin to Jhunkojee: and this adoption by the Maharanee was approved of by the chiefs, and confirmed by the British Government; the dignity and power of Regent being conferred on the Mama Sahib during the minority of the young Rajah, a boy only eight years of age.

KASGEEWHALA, THE USURPER OF GWALIOR.

The Dada Kasgeewhala, a most expert and artful intriguer, succeeded in gaining the confidence of the young Queen Dowager, and that of many chiefs; and having so done, expelled the Mama Sahib from the Gwalior state, removed all persons from office who were known as favourable to British interests, and restored those who had been previously dismissed on the remonstrances of the British Resident. Acts so offensive as these to the British Government called forth active measures, and the Maharanee was required to yield the Dada up; and that for better security and peace, he should be detained within our provinces. This, however, she was not disposed to do in the first instance, and it is doubtful if she had the power, the Dada having gained the confidence of the troops, and particularly of the celebrated Jhunsee, or brigade of artillery, consisting of one hundred pieces of ordnance, all of which were put in thorough order.

At length the Dada having withheld from the knowledge of the Maharanee and her council a letter conveying the sentiments of the Governor-General on the then state of affairs at Gwalior, a formal demand of his surrender to the British power was made, and at length complied with, under the impression that the troops would not allow him to go. He was, however, delivered up to the British authorities about a month previous to the battle of Punniar, and conveyed to Agra. He will soon be removed to Calcutta, there to remain a prisoner at large for the rest of his life.

There is no doubt the Dada Kasgeewhala was extremely popular amongst the soldiery, and that the British were equally as much disliked. The young Queen also was much inclined to follow the counsel given by him. The Dada's chief political enemy amongst the Maharattas was Bapoo Seesolia, who commanded a brigade of eight regiments.

THE GREAT PROVINCIAL DINNER AT CORK.

On Monday week this grand banquet to "the Liberator" came off with great éclat. A correspondent at Cork describes it as "certainly one of the most splendid things of the kind ever got up in this end of the country, and only surpassed by Covent Garden in space."

Mr. O'Connell and the other guests arrived at Cork on Saturday night, and from that hour till Tuesday the city was crowded with people. At nine o'clock on Monday morning, the Corporation of Waterford arrived in a splendid steamer, gaily decorated with flags, and a band of music playing on board: and the civic party were received with enthusiasm by the assembled hundreds on Penrose Quay. Then came coaches from every part of the country; and from ten to twelve o'clock, the streets presented one living stream of coach, car, and carriage; so that when the time of meeting (advertised the evening before) came round the city appeared as full as it was on the day of the great Monster Meeting. Our artist has sketched the western entrance to Cork, showing the Grand Parade; the Court House to the left; and in the left-hand foreground, the Lancasterian School, wherein the banquet took place.

The Cork Examiner states, that "the gentlemen who intended being present at the dinner assembled at the Mansion House, and having there formed in order of procession, they marched four a breast to the Lancasterian Schools, through a lane formed by a dense mass of human beings, who cheered as the several Corporations, mostly dressed in their robes, filed past. The spectacle was animating in an extraordinary degree, and the people felt cheered at the sight, as they reflected that it was perhaps the first time, certainly for hundreds of years, that men devoted to feelings of nationality, assumed the emblems of civic rank and distinction.

There were about 800 gentlemen present at the dinner, besides 300 ladies, in the galleries of the Banquet-hall. The appearance of the company was extremely gorgeous, from the rich display of ermine and gold, crimson and white, intermixed with the guests in full dress. Mr. W. S. O'Brien, M.P., took the chair Mr. O'Connell looked well, and in the best possible spirits: he spoke for three-quarters of an hour, but, our correspondent thinks, neither so well nor so wittily as on some former occasions; he considers the speech of Sir H. W. Barron to have been "the marrow of the meeting;" and Mr. John O'Connell made his father laugh even to tears. The Rev. Mr. Tierney, Dr. Gray, and Mr. Steele spoke with much applause, as did also the mayors of Cork, Lemerick, Kilkenny, and Clonmel. To the mayor of Cork our thanks are especially due, for his obliging attention to our artist.

A more detailed report appeared in our journal of last week.

NATIONAL EDUCATION.—THE MINISTRY.—We learn from a well-informed source, that a letter, the import of which has been correctly described by the Evening Mail, had been forwarded to Earl de Grey suggesting that, in future, those clergymen who supported the national system of education should alone be selected for promotion in the church. The ferment produced by the announcement that such a letter had been received induced Sir Robert Peel to communicate with Lord De Grey, respecting the means by which a confidential official document had been suffered to transpire in the newspapers. According to the information, Lord De Grey replied that he had shown the official letter to one individual only, but the name of that person, owing to peculiar circumstances of a delicate character, his Excellency distinctly declined to divulge. In the meantime, the repeated asseverations of the Evening Mail, as to the accuracy of its statement, caused general discontent and irritation amongst the Irish Church party; but some of the bishops deemed it more prudent to have Sir Robert Peel questioned on the subject in private than in the House of Commons. Accordingly, Mr. F. Shaw, member for Dublin University, obtained a private interview with the Premier, and inquired whether such a letter had been forwarded to the Irish Executive. Sir Robert Peel is said to have replied that a letter to the effect described had been written, not by himself, but by another minister, who expressed the views of the Cabinet—that that letter was intended solely for the guidance of the Irish Executive: but as, unhappily, its contents had been imprudently divulged, and the views of the Government thus thwarted, it had been determined to withdraw that letter altogether, and the Ministry were left to their own discretion as to the future course to be adopted.

WINDSOR.—AMATEUR PERFORMANCES.—On Tuesday evening the officers in garrison at Windsor, gave their fourth performance at the theatre in aid of the charitable institutions of the town. The pieces selected for the occasion were as follows:—

The Stranger, H. P. De Bathe, Esq., (Scots Fusilier Guards); Newspenny, Viscount Seaham (1st Life Guards).

Captain Bulkeley officiated as managing director, and the music was under the direction of Mr. Waddell (1st Life Guards). The house, as usual, was most fashionably attended, and the whole of the performances went off with great éclat. M. Bruce, Esq., being seriously ill, his part was taken at a short notice by Mr. Younge.

THE WINDSOR STEEPLE-CHASE.

The sympathy of the public has been drawn to three fatal catastrophes, which must be considered as painful drawbacks from the diversion of the above brilliant chase. We annex sketches of two of these accidents, which are certainly calculated to bring the modern practice of steeple-chasing into great disrepute, if they do not lead to its condemnation as "a practice equally cruel and senseless, having no plea whatever for its justification, and leading to the most fearful accidents both to man and horse."

The second and third sketches shows the catastrophe in the second race, on Tuesday, when, at a leap over a brook 17 feet wide and bush fence, several horses fell or stumbled, and two only of the lot were in at the winning-post; but Captain Sutton's mare Jessie, tasked so cruelly beyond her powers, fell just after the jump, throwing her rider, and making a complete summersault. In spite of his severe fall, he nevertheless quickly extricated himself, and, although bleeding, and hurt of course, disdained to complain. The poor mare remained on the ground, panting, sweating, trembling, and evidently unable to rise. After a quarter of an hour had been spent in fruitlessly striving to raise the animal, she was, by the help of many men, lifted up a little, so as to be set on her haunches. A great many spectators were of opinion that her back was broken, and that all attempts at recovery were only aggravations of cruelty. However, it was decided to persevere, and, finally, the noble suffering creature was, by the aid of poles shoved under her belly, lifted bodily up by main strength, and carried off the field by men to the nearest stable, her hind legs dragging uselessly and piteously behind her. Ultimately, she was destroyed.

The other sketch represents Lord Glammis's black gelding, the Stranger, who fell in trying to clear one of the numerous brooks; others fell at the same time, and being trod upon in the general confusion, he was so much injured as to make it necessary to shoot him.

In another part of our paper, we have given a spirited portrait of 'Lottery,' the winner of the first race.

PHILHARMONIC CONCERTS.

The second concert of the present season took place on Monday evening last, and went off most admirably. The following was the programme:—

Part I.

Sinfonia in C, No. 6	Mozart.
Duetto, "Quis est Homo?" Misses Williams ("Stabat Mater")	Rossini.
Dramatic Concerto, Violin. Herr Ernst	Spohr.
Quintette, "O cuite cieuente." Miss Williams, Miss Marshall, Miss M. Williams, Mr. J. Bennett, and Signor F. Lablache ("Il Crociato")	Meyerbeer.
Concerto in G. Minor, No. 3, Pianoforte. M. Moscheles	Moscheles.

Part II.

Sinfonia "Pastorale"	Beethoven.
Terzetto, "Fia grata al ciel." Miss Marshall, Mr. J. Bennett, and Signor F. Lablache ("Fidelio")	Ditto.
Introduction. Capriccio and Finale (on a Theme from "Il Pirata"). Violin, Herr Ernst	Ernst.
Quintetto, "Zemira! children! al. draw near." Miss Williams, Miss Marshall, Miss M. Williams, Mr. J. Bennett, and Signor F. Lablache ("Azor and Zemira")	Spohr.
Overture. "Tamerlane."	Winter.

Mr. T. Cooke, leader. Sir H. R. Bishop, conductor.

These concerts, as we remarked on the first of the series, are rapidly improving, or rather resuscitating their quondam excellence. The instrumental performances were all that could be desired. Mozart's Sinfonia, No. 6 (better known as "Jupiter") was magnificently performed, with the exception of the slow movement, the effect of which was somewhat marred by sawing the violins. There was no necessity for it—a piano, or soft treatment, was all that was required, and this could and should have been effected without resorting to the child's comb-and-paper means. The "Pastorale Sinfonia," of Beethoven, went off with all the freshness of a novelty. His works are not "for an age, but for all time." The wind instruments in this poetical composition were exquisite in the extreme. Ernst, the violinist, is much improved since we last heard him in this country, particularly in tone, a quality in which he is now superior to every other performer of his day, and yet still preserves the facility of the thin-stringed harmonies to the perfection of Paganini himself. It is difficult to decide between his merits and those of Sivori, but, perhaps, Ernst possesses more fire and energy, and Sivori more grace. Be it as it may, they are a "par nobile."

Our illustration, or portrait of Herr Ernst, is taken from a daguerrotype, and may be relied on as a faithful copy of this extraordinary violinist.

† The appearance of Moscheles in the orchestra once more, as a solo performer, was hailed with great enthusiasm. His concerto in G Minor was performed in the spirit it was composed in, and was a delicious treat to all mental musicians. No writer has ever been imbued with more clear-sightedness of design than Moscheles, and no orator ever delivered his written speeches with more elegance or effect than this Master-Musician, who could or can extemporize as well as play from previous reflection. The vocal part of the concert could not boast of a single solo: the concerted pieces were most excellent; but still dramatic compositions, which require the aid of situation, go off but poorly in a concert-room.

MR. AND MRS. KEELEY, IN "THE PAS DE TAMBOURINE AND CARVING-KNIFE," AT THE LYCEUM THEATRE.

LYCEUM THEATRE.

This is the scene of the Easter piece at this elegant theatre—the title "Open Sesame!"—the original, we need scarcely add, "The Forty Thieves." It is styled in that veritable chronicler of stage business, the bill, "the pas de tambourine and carving-knife." It is the very acmé of burlesque, and nothing can exceed the syren arts of Morgiana (Mrs. Keeley) to entrap the burly Hassarac (Mr. Keeley), or the knowingness with which he snatches the knife from the table just in time for self-defence. Never were two actors better qualified to play in the same scene than Mr. and Mrs. Keeley: their nice perception of the ludicrous and the absurd are the perfection of mimic art, and are seen to great advantage in the above scene. Nevertheless, there are many points in this tableau which are not to be described by the pen; and our artist has, we think, with his pencil, succeeded in portraying the individual characters as well as the accessories of the scene. Altogether, it is a sublime impersonation of drollery.

ANCIENT CONCERTS.

The third concert of the season took place last Wednesday night, under the direction of the Archbishop of York. Sir H. R. Bishop, conductor; Mr. Leder, leader; and Mr. Lucas, organist. The following was the programme:—

Part I.

Overture (Samson)	Handel.
Solo, Mr. Machin and Chorus, "Confiteantur tibi"	Raphini.
* Motet and Chorus, "Adoramus te Christe" (1565)	Palestrina.
Air, Mr. Manvers, "In native worth" (Creation)	Haydn.
German Hymn, Pauline Lang and Chorus.
Aria, Miss Rainforth, "Lascia ch' io pianga"	Handel.
Trio and Chorus, "Disdainful of danger"	Handel.
* Recit. and Aria, Madame Caradori Allan, "Potea quel pianto"	Pasiello.
Trio. "Fall'n is thy throne"	Mullico.
Double Chorus. "The Lord shall reign;" Solo, "Sung ye to the Lord," Madame Caradori Allan	Handel.

Part II.

Sinfonia in D, Andante and Finale	Beethoven.
Arietta, Miss Rainforth, "Invano alcun desiro"	Glück.
* Glee. "Oh thou that rollest," Messrs. Hawkins, Manvers, Peck, Bradbury, and Machin	Stevens.
* Aria, Pauline Lang, "Ah! vendimi qual core" (1686)	Rossi.
Chorus, "Domine ad adjurandum"	Porta.
Recit. and Aria, "Gran Dio" (Sargino)	Paer.
* Hymn, Full Choir, "O Saviour of the world" (1550)	Arcadelt.
Full Chorus, "From the censor" (Solomon)	Handel.

Here "of a verity" was a goodly show of the first flowers that Music ever bloomed forth: the selection does credit to the taste of the reverend director. The smorzeuse prefixed by an asterisk were performed for the first time at these concerts and were certainly beautiful specimens of "music in the olden time." Machin sang the first solo admirably, and Righini's chorus went admirably also. Palestrina's motet is a fine proof of how much more thought was bestowed on composition in his time than at present. "In Native Worth" was very charmingly sung by Mr. Manvers. We cannot say much of the "German Hymn." Miss Rainforth sang Handel's "Aria" most delightfully, and his trio, "Disdainful of Danger," was finely executed, although we think that merely doubling the parts is non-productive of additional effect. Madame Caradori was as usual l'charmante; in Pasiello's difficult but graceful air, which, by-the-by, is more instrumental than vocal. Mullico's trio is a pretty trifle, but the double chorus of "The Lord shall Reign," is a thing whose sublimity we will not dare to approach.

The second part commenced with two movements from Beethoven's symphony in D, which were finely performed. Miss Rainforth, who is now distinguishing herself as a concert, as well as dramatic vocalist, sang Glück's charming "Arietta" in a very pure style. Stevens' glee was admirably executed, and Pauline Lang appeared to more advantage in Rossi's air than in her previous performance. The chorus by Porta is a masterly composition—the fugue is wrought "ad unguem." Paer's song was delightfully sung by Caradori, and as delightfully accompanied on the clarionet by Williams. Arcadelt's Hymn is a little obsolete to modern ears, but still it contains some fine choral harmonies. Handel's magnificent chorus from Solomon wound up this delightful concert, and left the imprint of the giant musician upon everybody's memory.

The next (4th) Concert will take place on May the 1st, under the direction of Earl Howe.

SCENE FROM THE EXTRAVAGANZA OF "THE FAIR STAR," AT THE PRINCESS' THEATRE.

PRINCESS' THEATRE.

The graceful fairy tale of "Cherry and Fairstar" has furnished the staple of the Easter piece at this highly-embellished, nay, we had almost said, illuminated, home of the drama. The scene above represented is the port of Cherry Island, where Lord Stalk (a political caricature,) has convened a meeting for the purpose of "agitating." While he is addressing the meeting, mounted on the shoulders of two of his adherents, the galley, with Cherry, Fairstar, and Crambo, appears wafted along by syrens, and the people rush to the sight, leaving the unfortunate agitator sprawling on the ground. King Bigaroon (the monarch of the island,) advances to meet the strangers, and Fairstar, whose curls on being combed shower down money, treats the people to a scramble. The treasury being thus supplied, Stalk's star is suddenly dimmed, and he narrowly escapes a hanging. The scene concludes with general festivities, that is, a grand divertissement. This is, altogether, the most picturesque scene in the piece: it is pleasingly grouped, and effectively painted.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, APRIL 20, 1844.

THE commencement of term has again drawn the attention of the public to the proceedings in the Court of Queen's Bench, in Dublin, where the "convicted conspirators" are to be forthwith called up to receive judgment under that verdict of the jury which Sir Thomas Wilde says the Government bartered its honour to obtain. But the law has many devices for ensuring delay, and O'Connell, as an old and able practitioner, is just the person to have his quiver full of them. The interval between the verdict and the judgment will by no means be a blank; already there has been a notice given on the part of the chief "conspirator,"—for in England, at all events, the others are considered mere men of straw—for a new trial; first on the ground that the Court admitted improper evidence to be given on the part of the prosecution, and next, that the Chief Justice's charge was altogether partial—was, in fact, the chief injustice of the whole affair. The Attorney-General, though he did provoke a breach of the peace, and did not go through his task as prosecutor with all the calmness and temper of a man satisfied of the soundness of his case, yet he has not only defended himself in Parliament, but found defenders both in and out of it. Not so the Chief Justice; he has, by all sides, been given over to condemnation; there has been a feeling of general and settled disapprobation of a direction to a jury that dwelt only on the evidence of one side, and which might have been mistaken by a listener for the address of a dexterous pleader—and, in fact, the speech of a gentleman "on the other side." But the motion for a new trial will be argued in the same court, and before the same judges; is it at all probable that the Chief Justice will allow the soundness of a plea that would be, if successful, an indelible stain on his own judicial character? It may be looked on as certain that this part of the plea in support of the motion will fail. The misnaming of one of the jurors is also another ground of the application, as well as the much discussed omission of the "slips" in drawing up the original jury panel. On all these points the arguments will occupy some considerable time.

THE discussions in Parliament during the week have possessed some domestic interest: on Monday evening Sir Robert Peel, in compliance with a request from Mr. Wyse, postponed for a fortnight the second reading of the Irish Registration Bill. The interval afforded by the recess has made its provisions better known; and it appears to have awakened more opposition and excited less support than was expected by the Government. Seeing this feeling, it is supposed the Ministry is not very anxious to press it forward. It will, in all probability, be postponed and deferred from time to time till it expires under the influence of "the advanced period of the session;" a fate which Sir Robert Peel, in his reply to Mr. Wyse, said he foresaw would overtake many of the measures of this year, as it has those of years gone by. The Factory Bill—the wedge that has split the Conservative party into unaccountable sections, and brought side by side men who are usually in all things opposed—has not yet been re-introduced; but Lord Ashley and his supporters are too strongly pledged to the country to be able, even if they were disposed, to hang back, nor do we believe for a moment that the disposition exists. Lancashire may be assured that the struggle will soon be renewed.

A discussion of some length was raised on Monday evening by Mr. Hume, on a subject in which the public must be at all times interested—the manner in which the admission to our cathedrals and abbeys is restricted by means of the fees demanded at the doors. The tide of opinion is evidently setting in strong against these exactions, which turn the "solemn temples" into mere sources of profit. The poet made it a subject of regret that but far more immediate is the dissipation of every religious feeling at the cries of "give, give," which meet the visitor at every turn in these grand monuments of the piety and zeal of our ancestors. The spirit of this world has intruded into places which should be reserved as sanctuaries, and the dissensions and bitterness it has given rise to prove the truth of the text that we cannot at the same time "serve God and Mammon." Those Deans and Chapters who, like the authorities of Westminster Abbey, have reduced the fees of admission to so low a sum that we hope it has almost reached the vanishing point, will eventually compel others to do the same, were it only to escape the very unfavourable contrast to which they are at present subjected. The discussions that Mr. Hume has on more than one occasion also raised in the house, are productive of considerable good. Nothing can be more satisfactory than the following testimony borne by Sir R. Peel to the good conduct of the people when admitted freely to churches and museums:—

> "All charms fly

> It appeared to him that every facility ought to be given to the admission of the public to every building which was thought interesting, so far as that admission could be made consistent with the preservation of works of art. It appeared to him that nothing but good moral effects could arise from such freedom of admission. He conceived that free admission to public monuments and works of art must have the effect of leading the people away from vulgar and debasing pursuits. He did not mean to affirm that in all cases works of art tended to impress upon the mind the great truths of religion, but on the whole they did nothing excepting that which was good; and it was not possible that anything but good could arise out of them. Now, if that freedom of admission did not produce all the good that was possible, why should not an endeavour be made to do as much good as circumstances permitted? If the proposition were not perfect, still let them have the best which, under the circumstances, could be obtained. He confessed that it would afford him great satisfaction to see the humble classes freely admitted to view all public monuments and works of art, and he thought that in most cases the admission would not be attended with risk. At present, Westminster Abbey was open not only on Sundays, but on other days, during divine service. The effect of this was to interrupt those who could not pay for admission to come at the time of divine service. This practice he could not bring himself to think was at all favourable to religious impressions. (Hear, hear.) To induce people to attend divine service, he could not think they might see works of art, could certainly not be favourable to religious feeling."

There can be no one who has given the subject a moment's thought but must fully agree in the sentiments of the Premier. Out of doors the opinion is decidedly against those who have so long continued this practice, and we cannot conclude without extracting the following passage, directed against the neglect of the fabrics of our cathedrals, from a leader in the Times, which is far more inclined to support the church than to draw down censure upon it. But truth is truth, and here it is spoken; Deans and Chapters have neglected their duties. "We," says the Times, "bear no bigotted attachment to Deans and Chapters. They have fallen grievously short of what might be fairly expected of them. With the funds of which they, or at least some of them, are possessed, our cathedrals should have been in a state of continually growing magnificence. The ravages of the Rebellion should have been remedied; the unfinished designs of other ages should have been completed; the efficiency of the cathedral schools and choirs continually increased. They have not, it is true, had at their command the wealth which in former ages was employed to build those stupendous works of art; but they have surely had enough to mend what their forefathers created."

The discussion that followed this, was on a very opposite subject. The surviving officers of the Peninsular War, seeing the liberal hand with which medals and ribbons have been bestowed for services in India, themselves slighted and neglected, inasmuch as their toil was as hard, and the risks and their gallantry as great as those who are thus rewarded. Payment in honours is so cheap, and yet so highly prized, that we wonder our Government has not more frequently made a freer use of it. We have made honours depend too much on rank, and not enough on merit. It was not thus that Napoleon kindled the military ardour of his troops, whose prowess enabled him to conquer Europe. His star of the "Legion of Honour" did more for him than England effected by the expenditure of millions in solid gold. How the French prized the distinction, and how deeply they regretted the fall of him who created it, we know from the glowing verses so beautifully translated by Lord Byron:—

> Star of the Brave. whose beam has shed
> Such lustre o'er the quick and dead!
> Thou radiant and adored decree,
> Which nations rushed from earth to greet,
> Wild meteor of immortal birth
> Why rise in Heaven to set on Earth?

We have no emblem that could awake such enthusiasm; the distribution of honours is regulated by rank, and the line that cuts it off is drawn above the head of the "rank and file," who, as Colonel Napier strongly expresses it, "fight under the cold shade of Aristocracy." On the other hand, there is an evil in such honours, most felt perhaps in time of peace, in the unnatural thirst they create for military glory. At the present moment the French would go to war with any nation of the world for the mere sake of gaining military honour. In this respect, perhaps, the indifference the English as a nation exhibit to these distinctions, is an advantage. They feel that their conquests are not so likely to be those of arms, as of commerce and skill in the art of peace.

THE Anti-Corn-Law League has resumed its weekly meetings in Covent-Garden Theatre. There was nothing in the immediate proceedings of Wednesday evening particularly striking, but the announcement made by the Chairman, Mr. Cobden, of a sort of Free-Trade Bazaar, to be held in the Theatre, is interesting as a novelty. Specimens of machinery, and the products of machinery, are to be exhibited, in every possible variety; the display will something resemble the "Expositions" of the French manufacturers, except in the particular of the absence of prizes.

THE AMERICAN PRESS AND THE REV. SYDNEY SMITH.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE MORNING CHRONICLE.

SIR The Locofoco papers in America are, I observe, full of abuse of Mr. Everett, their minister, for spending a month with me at Christmas in Somersetshire. That month was a month out of their new calendar, but consisted of forty-eight hours;—a few minutes more or less.

I never heard a wiser or more judicious defence than he made to me and others, of the American insolvency; not denying the injustice of it, speaking of it, on the contrary, with the deepest feeling, but urging with great argumentative eloquence every topic that could be pleaded in extenuation. He made upon us the same impression he appears to make universally in this country; we thought him (a character which the English always receive with affectionate regard) an amiable American, republican without rudeness, and accomplished without ostentation. "If I had known that gentleman five years ago (said one of my guests), I should have been deep in the American funds; and, as it is, I think at times that I see nineteen or twenty shillings in the pound in his face."

However this may be, I am sure we owe to the Americans a debt of gratitude for sending to us such an excellent specimen of their productions. In diplomacy, a far more important object than falsehood, is, to keep two nations in friendship. In this point, no nation has ever been better served than America has been served by Mr. Edward Everett.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,
April 17. SYDNEY SMITH.

THE COURT AND HAUT TON.

WINDSOR, SUNDAY.—On Sunday morning her Majesty and Prince Albert, the ladies and gentlemen of the royal suite and household, attended divine service in the private chapel of the Castle. The Rev. C. L. Courtenay officiated. The Queen of the Belgians also attended divine service in the Roman Catholic chapel, Clewer-green. The Rev. F. Wilkinson officiated. The Queen and Prince Albert took their usual early walk during the forenoon. In the afternoon her Majesty and the Prince Leiningen, accompanied by Prince Esterhazy and Baron Stockmar, attended by Colonel Buckley. On the previous day Count Bjornstjerna, the Swedish Minister, and General Stjernecrona, arrived on a special mission from King Oscar, at the Castle, on a visit to the Queen. The Earl of Aberdeen also arrived in the evening. The King and Queen of the Belgians, the Duchess of Kent, and the Prince of Leiningen, went on Saturday morning to Bushy Park, to pay a visit to the Queen Dowager. They partook of a dejeuner with her Majesty, and afterwards proceeded to Claremont. The Queen of the Belgians, the Duchess of Kent, and the Prince of Leiningen, returned to the Castle in the evening to dinner. The King of the Belgians remained at Claremont.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

THE NEW LAW APPOINTMENTS.—The following Ministerial explanation of the motives that have influenced the appointment of Mr. Theseiger as Solicitor-General, appeared in the Morning Herald of Monday:—"Late on Saturday evening the friends of Mr. Frederick Pollock received information of his appointment to the office of Lord Chief Baron of the Exchequer; Sir William Follett, of his appointment to be Attorney-General; and Mr. Theseiger, to be Solicitor-General. The first two of the above appointments have long been anticipated as almost matters of course, but the last has occasioned very anxious consideration to the Government. While fully recognising the eminent qualifications of Mr. Bitzoy Kelly for the unpromising office of Attorney-General, it was found impossible to overlook the seniority, both at the bar, and as one of her Majesty's counsel, of Mr. Theseiger, who had, moreover, been already twice passed over, in the elevation of Sir William Follett to the post which he has just quitted, and of Mr. Justice Cresswell to a seat on the bench of the Common Pleas. Mr. Theseiger was called to the bar in the year 1816, and Mr. Kelly not till the year 1824, and Mr. Theseiger obtained a silk gown as long before Mr. Kelly, that no fewer than seventeen gentlemen obtained that distinction between Mr. Theseiger and Mr. Kelly. Under these circumstances, the Government were naturally anxious to avoid so signal a slight upon Mr. Theseiger as would have been inflicted upon him by the appointment of Mr. Kelly. This, we believe, is the consideration which determined the choice of the Government. It is not, moreover, difficult to imagine that, knowing that Mr. Kelly had been retained on behalf of Mr. O'Connell and his fellow traversers, to conduct the proceedings about to take place in the House of Lords, as their leading counsel, Ministers would feel a great delicacy in depriving them of so valuable assistance as that of Mr. Kelly. This must inevitably have been the case, had Mr. Kelly been promoted to the Solicitor-Generalship."

THE NEW CHIEF BARON OF THE EXCHEQUER.—Sir Frederick Pollock was on Monday sworn in a sergeant at law, and having proceeded to the Common Pleas, and having gone through the usual ceremonies there as sergeant, returned to the Lord Chancellor's room, and was sworn in Lord Chief Baron, the Queen's Remembrancer having administered the oath of office, and the Clerk of the Crown the oath of allegiance, &c. The Lord Chief Baron did not take his seat in the Court of Exchequer during the day. The Court of Common Pleas was crowded on Sir F. Pollock's entrance; and in the course of his progress through the courts the learned gentleman received the congratulations of his friends.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEJEUNER.—Monday being the first day of Easter Term, agreeably to ancient custom, the Lord Chancellor gave a breakfast to the several judges, at his private residence, George-street, Hanover-square. C Tindal, Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas; Baron Parke, Baron Alderson, Mr. Justice Patteson, Mr. Justice Coleridge, Mr. Justice Coltman, M

Justice Erskine, Baron Rolfe, Mr. Justice Wightman, and Mr. Justice Cresswell, were the judges present. There was a numerous party of the different learned personages connected with the several minor courts, and also Queen's counsel present, among whom we observed Sir Frederick Pollock, who attended for the last time in the official capacity of Attorney-General; Sergeants Andrews, Storks, Atherley, and Talfourd; Messrs. Thesiger (the new Solicitor-General); Wakefield, J. Miller, G. Spence, N. Underwood, W. C. Platt, G. Alexander, T. Starkie, C. T. Swanston, J. Stuart, Bethell, Godson, W. Whatley, and Hon. NEW COAL-TAX.—PROPOSED ENBANKMENT OF THE THAMES.—A public meeting was held at the Crown and Anchor Tavern, Strand, on Friday last, for the purpose of taking measures to oppose the proposed tax upon coals for the purpose of defraying the expense of the embankment of the Thames. Mr. Masterman, M.P., having been placed in the chair, various resolutions were proposed and carried, the speakers, for whose remarks we cannot find room, all dwelling upon the impolicy and injustice of the tax. A petition, embodying the sentiments of the meeting, was agreed to be presented to the House of Commons by the chairman, and the co-operation of the eight Metropolitan members was requested to support the prayer, and a deputation, consisting of the members of Parliament present, were requested to wait upon Sir Robert Peel on the subject. The resolution was carried unanimously. A vote of thanks was passed to the chairman for his able conduct in the chair, and the meeting separated.

A quarrel having occurred at a public house between two men belonging to each regiment, the affair was taken up by their respective comrades, to the number of between 300 and 400 on either side, and, from the severe blows which were exchanged, fatal consequences were expected to ensue. Piquets from each regiment, amounting to 300 men, with fixed bayonets, under the command of captains and subalterns, were immediately ordered out; but it was upwards of two hours before the whole of the men could be captured and secured within their respective barracks. We understand that several who were seriously injured are now confined to the hospital. The 44th Regiment is 900 strong, and the last battalion of the Grenadier Guards about 700. It is expected that one of the regiments will be ordered into another district.

HORRIBLE MASSACRE IN ONE OF THE SOUTH SEA ISLANDS.—DESTRUCTION OF THE HARRIET WHALE SHIP.

The details of another attack on an English whaler, and murderous slaughter of the whole crew, by the natives of one of the South Sea Islands, have just been received by Mr. Rossex, a whale ship belonging to Mr. Lyall, M.P. for the city of London, under the command of Captain Worth, which arrived in the river the day before yesterday, after an absence of four years and three months.

The following details, kindly supplied to the reporter by Captain Hammer, contain all the news of any reference to the melancholy event:—

Captain Hammer states that on the 4th of April, last year, having occasion to take in water, he bore down towards the island marked Qualian on the chart, but usually known among whalers as Strong's Island,—being in longitude 163° 5., by latitude 5 N. On approaching the harbour, he found three American whale ships and one Canadian vessel lying at anchor. These vessels subsequently proved to be the Pacific, Captain Rounds, from St. John's, New Brunswick and the Lydia, the Lexington, and the Pearl, three American whalers. As the Sussex neared the island, the captains of these vessels came off in boats to meet her, and Captain Rounds, of the Pacific, immediately communicated to Captain Hammer the fact of the wreck of an English whaler called the Harriet, belonging to the port of London, and commanded by Captain Barker, lying in eight fathoms water within the harbour. Having cast anchor at a convenient distance from shore, Captain Hammer returned with Captain Rounds on board the Pacific, where portions of the Harriet's hay Both her figure head, anchor, &c. all of which had been recovered at that time, were shown to him, by which the identity and fate of the vessel was placed beyond a doubt. Captain Rounds next recovered various articles from the wreck, including the anchors and chains, a large quantity of new iron hoop-ing, which, when evidently burnt to a white heat, the figure 3 and the full length figure of a woman with a coronet, the lower dead eyes, and a large quantity of rigging, &c. It is well known that when whaling ships touch at these islands, the natives are women frequently come on board in large numbers, and, generally speaking, they are considered well-conducted savages. On this occasion advantage was taken of their familiarity, and the fact, that a vessel had been attacked and the crew murdered was elicited from several among them, and confirmed by a variety of circumstances.

Captain Rounds subsequently obtained from some native women the following particulars:—That Harriet had put into the island for wood and water, and that on interview between her crew and the natives was apparently carried on in the usual friendly manner. A deep plot, however, seems to have been laid by the natives, which the same time unfolds a considerable degree of cunning. Soon after shortly after their arrival, the captain and the surgeon went ashore shooting, the boats' crews being engaged in collecting wood, and one in taking in water. Out of a crew of from 27 to 30 persons, only five remained on board the ship, and this fact, doubtless, being observed by the natives, who were anxiously watching an opportunity, they simultaneously attacked the different parties, killing each almost instantaneously Resistance would appear to have been hopeless, for although the island is not more than 37 miles in circumference, it is very thickly populated, and from three to four hundred natives were frequently seen on the shore at one time by Captain Rounds. The five persons who were on board ship at the time, observed the attack on their comrades, and seeing a number of canoes putting off towards the vessel, they hastily embarked in affloat, and have evidently no possibility being, that as Strong's Island is situated at a long distance from any other, they all must have perished in the few following days. In the course of Captain Rounds' investigation on the island, he fortunately discovered four or five leaves of the Harriet's log, from which it appeared that the ships had recently been to Port Jackson, for the purpose of undergoing some repairs, and the captain had made an entry to the effect that he had sad some trouble with his crew. Finding all their endeavours fail to procure more information, the several ships above alluded to bore up and stood away from the island together, parting company some days subsequently.

The Harriet was the property of Messrs. Beaulcut, of Paul's Wharf, London. She left England in June, 1839, and has consequently been absent nearly five years. No tidings had been heard of her during the last 18 months, and her owners had previously effected an additional insurance of £1000, making a total of £7500. Many of her crew left her at Sydney, whose places were supplied by others; it is therefore impossible to give the names of those lost correctly.

It is proved beyond a doubt that three other vessels have been destroyed in a similar manner at the same island, information to that effect having been obtained by Captain Rounds. These vessels are supposed to have belonged to some of the Sandwich Islands—perhaps that locality visiting Strong's Island.

Captain Hammer states it as his opinion, that although there may be no Englishmen resident on the island at present, there must have been at some previous time, as the natives are so well versed in the English language. He adds, that the natives appeared extremely desirous to prevent his becoming acquainted with any of the circumstances of the affair, affecting a degree of indifference with regard to the American captains. On entering the harbour, it was suggested to him that it might be advisable to hoist the American standard at his masthead, instead of the union jack. This, however, he declined to do.

CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT.—FRIDAY.

Mr. Justice Williams took his seat on the bench at ten o'clock; and the prisoners having been again placed at the bar, and the names of the jury called over,

Mr. Erle proceeded to reply; and after going through the evidence at great length, the learned gentleman concluded a speech of consummate talent, equally remarkable for dispassionateness and close reasoning (which pressed very hardly upon the prisoner Barber), by leaving the matter with confidence in the hands of the jury.

Mr. Justice Williams summed up. He complimented the jury upon the attention which they had paid to the case. It was most creditable to them, for the question was one of great public interest and importance. The learned counsel who had addressed them on behalf of Mr. Barber had made many passionate appeals to their feelings; it was his duty to tell them, that in discharging the trust confided to them, they must not listen to such appeals, but must weigh the matter with calm

LAUNCH OF "THE ARIEL" STEAMER, AT ROTHERHITHE.

LAUNCH OF THE ARIEL STEAMER AT ROTHERHITHE

On Tuesday last, Rotherhithe was a scene of unusual gaiety, owing to the launch of a new steamer, the Ariel, built by Mr. Thompson, for the Woolwich Steam Packet Company.

The main dimensions of this fine vessel are—length, 120 feet; breadth, 14 feet 6 inches; tonnage, 120; she is built with a round stern, and of diagonal planking, three thicknesses, all mahogany: she has two engines of 20 horse power each, and has been built expressly for a passage vessel between Woolwich and Hungerford; and will carry, with her coals, boilers, &c., 600 persons, at a draught of water 3 feet 6 inches.

THE NEW RECORD-ROOM, HERALDS' COLLEGE.

This handsome apartment has just been completed, upon the site of the old Record-Room, in Heralds' College, upon St. Benet's-hill. It was built by Mr. Cubitt, of Gray's Inn-road, from the designs of Messrs. Abraham and Son. It contains all the heraldic records, patents of arms and names, heralds' visitations, and the various documents relating to arms and the college; arranged in shelved recesses inclosed by doors. The room is ornamented with various portraits of officers of arms; amongst them are Sir Gilbert Dethick, Garter King-at-Arms; John Austis, Garter; Peter Le Neve, Norroy; John Talbot, Earl of Shrewsbury, &c.

The Heralds have been incorporated upwards of three centuries and a half. They were first located in Cold Harbour, Upper Thames-street. Thence they removed to Charing-cross, where now stands Northumberland House; in 1555, to Derby, or Stanley House, on St. Benet's-hill, Doctors' Commons. Derby House was destroyed in the great fire, 1666. The present college was erected on the old site, after the design of Sir Christopher Wren: the edifice is of brick, and has a gloomy appearance, somewhat in keeping with the faded glories of the foundation. Nevertheless, applications to examine records are treated with uniform courtesy; and, seeing that a new impulse has been given to art by the works of modern antiquaries, we hope, with the writer of the history of the college in Knight's "London," that it will "from its yet unexplored treasures of antiquity shed a flood of light upon the history, manners, customs, and habits of the people of England."

IMPERIAL FEET WASHING.—An example of this pious ceremony, in which humble duties are performed by the great and powerful towards their most lowly fellow-creatures recently occurred in the Austrian capital. It was alike remarkable for the illustrious rank of the feet washers and the extreme longevity of some of the persons on whom the ablution was performed. A letter in the Allgemeine Zeitung, dated Vienna, April 5, state, that on the preceding day (Maundy Thursday, or, as the Germans call it, Grun Donnerstag), their Majesties the Emperor and Empress washed the feet of 12 aged men and 12 aged women, who after the ceremony were regaled with a dinner, and each received a present of new clothing. Of the men the oldest was 110 years of age, and the youngest 83; of the women, the oldest was 106, and the youngest 84. The ceremony was, as usual, attended by a vast concourse of spectators.

THE SLAVE TRADE.—The slaver Josephine, Lieut. Jamieson in charge, one of the three slavers captured by her Majesty's steamer Thunderbolt, arrived at Table Bay on January 29, having on board 467 negroes—viz., 240 males and 227 females. The other two slavers had not reached port, but were daily expected.

We are glad to learn that tonnage is in brisk demand at Liverpool. The desirable change is attributed to the success of the guano trade. The import of this new article of commerce has given a large amount of employment to shipping, which promises to continue and to increase. Whole cargoes of the article are readily sold on arrival, and it cannot be obtained in sufficient quantity to supply the market. Shipping is said to have advanced within the last month 10 per cent.

BOSTON, April 1.—The D. R. Martin, sailed from Rochelle for this port, Nov. 14, and has not since been heard of.

THE NEW RECORD-ROOM, HERALDS' COLLEGE.

THE REV. DR. CROLY.

This gentleman is a native of Ireland, and was educated at Trinity College, Dublin. He is a correct and eloquent poet and prose-writer: his poetical works are "Parisin 1815;" "The Angel of the World;" "Gems from the Antique," &c. Dr. Croly has also edited, with excellent judgment, a volume of Selections from the British Poets. Among his many prose works are "Salathiel," a romance founded on the old legend of "The Wandering Jew," and displaying the most powerful bursts of eloquence throughout its pages. Several years since, too, Dr. Croly published a comedy, entitled "Pride Shall Have a Fall," which was performed for several nights, with great applause, at Covent Garden Theatre, and was universally admired for its unsparing ridicule of the follies of the day. "A Life of Burke," and the "Personal History of George IV.," are among Dr. Croly's biographical works; and a volume on the "Apocalypse of St. John," attests his erudite research; he is at present engaged in writing the descriptions of Mr. Roberts's splendid "Illustrations of the Holy Land, &c."

Dr. Croly is rector of St. Stephen's, Walbrook; his style of preaching is characterised by impressive eloquence. By virtue of his office he has presided at some of the numerous vestry-meetings held of late upon the distracted affairs of the parish of St. Stephen; and, upon each occasion, his conduct has commanded the respect of the parishioners; whilst his anxiety for the restoration of their beautiful church bespeaks his just appreciation of high art.

The talent of Dr. Croly as a public speaker was most conspicuous on Tuesday last, at a meeting of the members of the Syrian Medical Aid Association, at Beyrout, held at the Hall of Commerce, Threadneedle-street. Upon this interesting and important occasion, Dr. Croly thus eloquently advocated the wants of suffering humanity: Nothing can be more evident than the want of medical aid in those vast and interesting countries at the head of the Mediterranean. Every traveller gives his testimony to this want, and every traveller comes away with details of popular wretchedness arising from this source, and appeals to the common sense and common humanity of nations. And this becomes more to be regretted, from the circumstance that the suffering is almost wholly the result of medical destitution. The climate is one of the finest in the world, the soil fertile, the hills bearing the olive and the vine, the plains loaded with corn, the year almost divided between spring and summer; and yet, in the midst of this favoured region, there remains the victim of fearful suffering, broken down with hopeless disease, given over to helpless agony, a blot on the rich and smiling creation around him. Would it be believed that until lately there was not one regular practitioner from the border of Egypt to Lebanon. Now, we who know how essential the offices of the medical man are to the common comfort of life—how destitute, in our own country, even a village seems, which has not medical aid within reach—how tremblingly we look upon the first symptoms of illness in an infant—how eagerly we call for the assistance of the practitioner, and how anxiously we count the hours until he comes—we may conceive the boundless terror produced by the approach of disease in the East, where the first symptom of distemper is necessarily regarded almost as a signal of a death warrant, for help is beyond all reach; the land might be searched from end to end before a physician could be found, and the result is, that the unhappy husband and father must sit still and gaze while his wife or child is dying day by day before his eyes. And even this bitter feeling is made more bitter still by a kind of vague conviction that there are means in existence by which life might be preserved, if they were but within his reach. Follow this conception into reality, see the infection spread, see father and wife and child gradually sinking, until their cabin becomes a pest-house, and, deserted by all their kindred and neighbours through absolute terror, they perish a mass of startling mortality. But the diseases of the East are not merely more destitute of medical help; they are in their general nature of a more fearful, fierce, and torturing kind than those of temperate climates. There infection is the instant seizure of the whole frame, fever is fire, the wound is an ulcer, the small-pox is a pestilence, and typhus takes the shape of plague. It has even been said that the plague never ceases in the regions of Mahometanism: when it pauses in one quarter, it bursts out in another, and in all continually shakes the quiet of life and threatens the existence of the population. It is into this scene of suffering that we propose to send, it is beside this fountain-head of disease that we propose to plant, the science which will dry it up. It is to relieve intolerable pangs, to restore the men to the incalculable blessings of health, to cheer the hearts of all, to inspire new homage to the humanity of England, even to make a noble inroad on the common mortality of man, that we are called on at this hour, in the name of sympathy and humanity, to assist an institution which has no other object that the happiness of society, and, I solemnly believe, the honour of God. Gentlemen, we all take an interest in the renown of our country, and I envy not the man who can follow the career of our great statesmen in their senatorial struggles, without due homage to their accomplished understanding. The heart of England has long paid its tribute to the great champions of its liberty and illustrious leaders of its armies; but in the midst of all our national trophies—in the midst of all that accumulation of the tributes of past ages to the achievements of eminent men—if I could venture to propose raising one memorial more, the memorial of a triumph gained neither in the senate nor the field, and yet, not less expressive, less permanent, nor less illustrious than them all; I should say that that memorial would be a British Hospital in Syria.

—In conclusion, Dr. Croly touchingly observed: "There is but one topic more, to which, as a clergyman, I may be expected to allude, and yet to which, from my being a clergyman, I allude as briefly as possible—the sacred recollections of which Palestine and Syria have been the especial scene. I am at all times most unwilling to introduce scriptural subjects into public assemblies; and yet, when we hear of this new attempt to heal the sick, to give feet to the lame, ears to the deaf, a tongue to the dumb, and sight to the blind—when we see the sufferers coming in crowds, 4000 flocking to the agent of your institution, I am irresistibly reminded of the glorious scene, when the Great Healer, alike of the heart and the frame, stood in the streets of Nazareth or Capernaum, and they brought to him each of divers diseases, the fevered, the paralyzed, the lunatic, the dying, and he healed them all. With what a different sense of existence did they return. What a delighted contrast to the decrepitude and misery with which they came! what pangs of heart, instead of their long despair! what long-forgotten elasticity of limb in the shepherd, the hunter, and the husbandman! and what gratitude to the heaven-descended benevolence which pitied, received, and healed them all! And this institution, which we are now attempting to form, what is it but an imitation, in all humility and reverence, of that highest of all conceivable examples?"

We are authorised to state that there will be no public dinners at Lambeth Palace this season.

SOCIETY FOR PROMOTING CHRISTIAN KNOWLEDGE.—On Tuesday the ordinary monthly meeting of the members of this society was held at the offices, Lincoln's Inn Fields, the Rev. Dr. Russell, rector of St. Botolph's, Bishopsgate, in the chair. Letters were read from several colonial bishops, requesting grants towards the erection of churches, and other means of promoting religious instruction, which were accordingly made, as were others to numerous parishes in England. Several new members were admitted.

DESTRUCTION OF ST. PAUL'S CHURCH, CANADA WEST.—We regret to learn that the church of St. Paul, Western Canada, was accidentally destroyed by fire on the 21st of February (Ash Wednesday). This edifice, which was raised entirely by the contributions of the congregation, principally the former residents of England and Ireland, cost £1600. By the present deplorable occurrence they are deprived of a place of public worship. In the hour of their distress they make an appeal to their fellow-churchmen at home, in order that they may be enabled to re-build their sacred edifice.

THE WILLS FORGERY TRIALS.

JUSTICE WILLIAMS. BARON GURNEY. JUSTICE MAULE.

THE BENCH, DURING THE TRIAL.

CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT.

On Monday morning, when the judges entered, the court was exceedingly crowded, the most intense anxiety being manifested to hear the charge of Baron Gurney. Exactly at ten o'clock the learned judges took their seats upon the bench, on which sat Alderman Sir C. Marshall, together with Sheriffs Musgrove and Moon, and several most respectably-dressed ladies. Immediately upon the prisoners being placed at the bar, Mrs. Dorey fell back in a fainting fit.

Before the judge commenced summing up, Mr. Graves said that after he had left the court on Saturday, a point had occurred to him, which he wished permission to submit to their lordships. Under the provisions of the statute 22 and 23 Charles II., cap. 10, sec. 4, the ordinaries and judges of the Prerogative Court, the letters of administration having been once granted, were obliged to allow the bond to be entered into: and as it had been entered into, although in a wrong name, the statute having in all respects been complied with, the bond could not be said to be a forged one.

Mr. Clarkson cited a case in which a person had been convicted of forging such a bond. His friend was quite mistaken as to the effect of the bond; for i his doctrine were correct, it would show that it was impossible to forge such a bond. Mr. Baron Gurney overruled the objection. There could be no doubt, whatever that the indictment had been properly framed.

Mr. Wilkins then gave some explanation to the reply of the learned Attorney-General. After which,

Baron Gurney proceeded to sum up, and at the end of three hours, concluded a most minute and lucid recapitulation of the evidence.

The jury then retired to consider their verdict, and while they were absent the Court withdrew for refreshment; previous to which Mr. Wilkins said, that as it would be impossible to get through the next case that day, he hoped the Court would defer it till next morning; and the more especially as, after the laborious attention he had been compelled to pay to the case which had just been concluded, he and his friend Mr. Barry were not quite prepared. The learned judges assented to the application.

The jury were only absent about fifteen minutes. When they returned the most intense anxiety was manifested, the prisoners being immediately replaced in the dock, all of whom looked most anxiously at the jury.

THE VERDICT.

Clerk of the Arraigns.—How say you, is William Henry Barber Guilty, or Not Guilty?—Foreman: "Not Guilty."

How say you, is Joshua Fletcher Guilty, or Not Guilty?—Foreman: "Guilty."

How say you, is Georgiana Dorey Guilty, or Not Guilty?—Foreman: "Guilty."

At the termination of the judge's summing up, a calmness appeared in the countenance of Barber; but Fletcher and Mrs. Dorey seemed to be very gloomy.

Barber paid the greatest attention to the summing up of Baron Gurney, and remained standing during a part of the morning; but Fletcher and Mrs. Dorey were both accommodated with chairs, and fixed their eyes upon the judge as he proceeded.

The jury, in the interval between Saturday night and Monday morning, had been treated with every indulgence consistent with their situation. After having attended Divine Service in the chapel of Newgate on Sunday morning, they proceeded, in an omnibus, expressly engaged for the occasion, to Blackwall, in the custody of the Under Sheriffs and the crier of the court. Having been treated to a ride through the green lanes, they dined at Lovegrove's Brunswick Hotel, and returned to the London Coffee-house, where they remained till the morning.

SECOND CASE.

At ten o'clock on Tuesday Mr. Justice Williams and Mr. Justice Maule took their seats on the bench at the Central Criminal Court. William Henry Barber, Joshua Fletcher, William Sanders, Lydia Sanders, and Georgiana Dorey, were placed at the bar.

Mr. Erle, Q.C., Mr. Clarkson, Sir John Bayley, and Mr. Bodkin, appeared as counsel for the prosecution. For the prisoner Barber, Mr. Wilkins and Mr. Parry. For Fletcher, Mr. Graves and Mr. Ballantine. For the Sanderses, Mr. Stone and Mr. Phinn. Mr. Straight, the clerk of the arraigns, read the abstract of the indictment on which the prisoners were arraigned. It set forth that in the year 1842 there was a sum of £3500 Consols lying in the name of Anne Slack, the dividends on which, not having been claimed for upwards of ten years, the entire had been conveyed to the commissioners for the reduction of the national debt. It then proceeded to charge a person unknown with forging a testamentary document purporting to be the last will and testament of Ann Slack, deceased, bequeathing the above sum of £3500 Consols to one Emma Slack, with intent to defraud Ann Slack; and the prisoners Lydia Sanders, Barber, Fletcher, William Sanders, and Georgiana Dorey, as accessories before the fact to the said forgery.

In the second count, Lydia Sanders and W. H Barber, were charged with uttering the forged document, well knowing it to be forged, and the other prisoners with being accessories before the fact. The third and fourth counts were similar to the first and second, only charging the intent with being to defraud the Governor and Company of the Bank of England. The fifth and sixth were also similar, but laying the intent as being to defraud Charles S. Lefevre and others, commissioners for the reduction of the national debt. There were three other counts, charging William Henry Barber as principal in forging the beforenamed document, and the other prisoners as being accessories before the fact. The three next counts charged Lydia Sanders and Barber with uttering. In these twelve counts the forged documents were set out. There were twelve other counts similar, with the exception that the documents were not set out.

The prisoners were all accommodated with chairs.

Mr. Erle stated the case to the jury, and afterwards called a number of witnesses, but we have already given the substance of their evidence whilst being examined before the Mansion-house authorities. These witnesses consisted, for the most part, of bank clerks, and proctors and clerks belonging to Doctors' Commons. Mr. Erle next proposed to call a Mr. Philpotts.

Mr. Justice Williams asked Mr. Erle if he was about to go into a new line of evidence? Mr. Erle said he was.

Mr. Wilkins said he would probably have to examine Mr. Philpotts at greater length than any witness hitherto brought forward.

Mr. Justice Williams thought it better in that case to adjourn the Court at once.

The Court accordingly adjourned at a quarter before five o'clock, to ten o'clock on Wednesday morning.

Mr. Doane applied for the discharge of Griffin, on the ground that his wife was so ill as to be considered at the point of death. Sir John Bayley, for the Crown, having no objection, the application was granted, and Griffin was immediately set at liberty.

WEDNESDAY.

At ten o'clock, Mr. Justice Williams entered the court, which was quite as crowded as during the previous days. The remaining witnesses for the prosecution were very numerous. The sale and transfer of stock having been proved, and the parties having been identified, the forged will was put in and read; as was also the affidavit for obtaining the probate, and several other documents which were used for the prosecution.

Edward Wife examined.—I am articled clerk to Mr. Flower, the solicitor for Mrs. Dorey. The statement produced is a voluntary statement on the part of Mrs. Dorey, and it is signed by her as such.

[The statement purported to be a confession by Mrs. Dorey.]

Mr. Wilkins complained that Mr. Erle had not mentioned this statement in his opening.

Mr. Erle said he would not press the statement, and it was consequently not read.

This was the case for the prosecution, and the defence being reserved for next day's proceedings, the Court adjourned.

THURSDAY.

Mr. Justice Williams entered the court and took his seat on the bench at ten o'clock, and the prisoners, Barber, Fletcher, William Sanders, Lydia Sanders, and Georgiana Dorey, were again placed at the bar.

Mr. James, on the part of Mrs. Dorey, begged to state that she wished to withdraw her plea of "Not Guilty," and to put in a plea of "Guilty." Perhaps he was not exceeding his duty in asking the jury to recommend her to mercy.

Mr. Justice Williams said he could not interfere with the jury. He was sure that the verdict in the first case would not influence them. The learned judge asked Mr. Erle if he had any objection to the course proposed by Mr. James?

Mr. Erle replied in the negative, and the plea of not guilty on the part of Mrs. Dorey was then withdrawn, and a plea of guilty was entered.

Mr. Graves, on behalf of Fletcher, submitted that the indictment was not properly framed. It charged the prisoners with jointly committing the acts alleged against them, whereas they could not joint acts together. The charges ought to have been made separately, and proved separately, and, according to the law laid down in the King v. Messingham, his client was entitled to a verdict of Not Guilty. A joint procurement must be proved where there was a joint charge.

Mr. Ballantine followed on the same side.

Mr. Justice Williams said he could not stop the case. The pleading of guilty of one of the prisoners did not in his opinion alter the position of the case. He certainly should not give any opinion upon whether there was a case against the whole or any of the prisoners. It seemed to him that the argument came to this, that unless the whole of the parties were present at the uttering of the forged will there could be no procurement or excitement.

Mr. Stone said he did not think there was any evidence against William Sanders to go to the jury.

Mr. Justice Williams thought there was evidence against Sanders.

Mr. Stone then proceeded to address the jury on behalf of Barber. From the appearance of the court at that moment, it could seem that the public interest in this important case had not been diminished. Need he say that the difficulties he had to encounter in defending his client were increased up to the charge alleged against him had been, with other parties; but, at the same time, he must confess he felt in some degree relieved by the circumstance of the great attention which had been paid to the case throughout by every member of the jury—a circumstance which must be deeply gratifying to the unfortunate persons who were arraigned before them. He acknowledged that the case had been conducted on the part of the prosecution in a spirit of fairness, and he trusted that the same spirit would actuate him to the close. He counted on behalf of his client, nay, he demanded on his behalf, the fullest scrutiny and inquiry in reference to his conduct and character. He was in hopes that after the case had come to this, that unless the whole of the parties were present at the uttering of the forged will there could be no procurement or excitement.

Mr. Stone said he did not think there was any evidence against William Sanders to go to the jury.

Mr. Justice Williams thought there was evidence against Sanders.

Mr. Stone then proceeded to address the jury on behalf of Barber. From the appearance of the court at that moment, it could seem that the public interest in this important case had not been diminished. Need he say that the difficulties he had to encounter in defending his client were increased up to the charge alleged against him had been, with other parties; but, at the same time, he must confess he felt in some degree relieved by the circumstance of the great attention which had been paid to the case throughout by every member of the jury—a circumstance which must be deeply gratifying to the unfortunate persons who were arraigned before them. He acknowledged that the case had been conducted on the part of the prosecution in a spirit of fairness, and he trusted that the same spirit would actuate him to the close. He counted on behalf of his client, nay, he demanded on his behalf, the fullest scrutiny and inquiry in reference to his conduct and character. He was in hopes that after the case had come to this, that unless the further charges against Mr. Barber would not have been prosecuted; and that that unfortunate gentleman would have been restored to the confidence of his friends and to his proper position in society. That hope he had founded upon the clear and complete proof that had been given of his innocence; but it had not been realised, and he had now to combat fresh allegations. The accusation charged Mr. Barber with forgery he had been supported by evidence, and those charges must necessarily fall to the ground. He asked not for mercy, he asked not for pity; if the charge had been made out against him, he was required but he should be punished; but if it had not been made out against him, then the law of God, the laws of the country, and their own consciences demanded a verdict of acquittal. But notwithstanding the efforts of all the parties to crush Mr. Barber—and they had succeeded in depriving him not only of his fame, but of every species of property, so that when he left that dock, which he had no doubt he would do soon, he had not a bed to lie down upon or a penny to buy food—notwithstanding all the watching on the part of their officers and their other emissaries, they had not been able to prove that Mr. Barber had acted otherwise throughout the whole of these transactions than as an honest and upright attorney. The learned gentleman continued for upwards of an hour to address the jury in defence and to comment upon it. His address occupied nearly five hours in delivery, but his arguments were a repetition of those which he used in Stewart's case on Saturday last.

Mr. Greves having addressed the jury on behalf of the prisoner Fletcher,

Mr. Stone was about to address the jury for William Sanders and Lydia Sanders, when

Mr. Justice Williams said that though he did not think there was no evidence to go to the jury with regard to William Sanders, yet it was for them to say, before the learned counsel addressed them, whether there was such evidence against him as was worthy of their serious consideration. There was not the least evidence that he had any knowledge of the uttering of the forged will—supposing it to be forged—which was necessary, in point of law, to make him guilty. They would therefore consider whether they would think it necessary for the learned counsel to address them for William Sanders.

The jury did not think there was any evidence against him, and they accordingly brought in a verdict of "Not Guilty."

Mr. Stone then addressed the jury for Lydia Sanders.

The same evidence which was given in the former case as to the character of Mr. Barber was given before the present jury. They all stated that Mr. Barber was a person of respectability and honour.

It being now past five o'clock, the Court adjourned till Friday morning, when Mr. Erle is to reply.

THE MURDER AT MARYLEBONE.—Mr. Clarkson applied to the Court to postpone the trial of William Crouch, for the murder of his wife, Frances Crouch, until the next session. The learned counsel said the ground upon which he made the application was, that if time were afforded, he expected to be able to produce material evidence on behalf of the prisoner, for the nature of that evidence would refer to the prisoner's state of mind, and he was instructed that he should be able to show that at the time of the commission of the act imputed to him, he was not conscious of what he was doing. Mr. Harrison added that the prisoner had only been in communication with Mr. Humphreys, his attorney, since Saturday, and he had in his hand an affidavit embodying the above facts, and stating, in addition, that the prisoner had imputed his head by a fall from his horse, and that he had been under treatment for concussion of the brain.—Mr. Parry, who was instructed for the prosecution, said that if the Court thought sufficient had been stated to justify them in postponing the trial, he should, of course, not offer any objection.—The Court expressed an opinion that, under the circumstances, the case might be postponed until the next session.

Henry Reynolds, labourer, 44, was indicted for the manslaughter of John West. The particulars of this case have appeared very recently. The prisoner was driving a cart on the Edgeware-road, being at the time somewhat intoxicated, and, in order to avoid some vehicle, he struck his horse with the whip and made him jump suddenly on one side, and in so doing he knocked down the deceased, and the wheel of his cart went over him and killed him. The prisoner was not driving at any speed, and the accident was occasioned entirely from the incapacity of the prisoner to take proper charge of his vehicle by reason of his condition from drink.—The jury found the prisoner Guilty, but recommended him to mercy.—Mr. Justice Maule sentenced him to one month's imprisonment and hard labour.

George Bassett, 21, John Grant, 25, and James Baker, were indicted for a burglary in the dwelling-house of James Lindsay, at Lewisham, and stealing £3 in bank notes and other property. The prisoner Baker pleaded guilty.—Mr. Doane conducted the prosecution, and Mr. Payne defended Bassett. The other prisoner had no counsel.—The jury returned a verdict of Guilty, and the Common Sergeant sentenced them to be severally transported beyond the seas for the term of ten years.

NEW COURT.

(Before the Recorder, &c.)

George Pitman, 27, was indicted for a burglary in the dwelling-house of Charles Todd, and stealing therein various articles, the property of his grandmother, the prosecutrix in the case. It appeared that the prisoner's mother died in his early infancy; that he had grown up a bad boy, and arrived at a wicked man's estate; and that he had often been guilty of even worse offences, having been previously convicted (in 1838) of burglary, and suffered nine months' imprisonment. The grandmother was the chief witness.—The jury found the prisoner Guilty, and he was sentenced to ten years' transportation.

At an early hour on Wednesday morning a number of respectable persons entered this court, principally residents at or near Ipswich, anxious to hear the trial of Mr. William Read, of Ipswich, for destroying a vessel.

At ten o'clock, Mr. Justice Maule, Aldermen Sir J. Pirie, Hunter, &c., took their seats on the bench, and a jury, consisting of gentlemen acquainted with nautical affairs, were empannelled, and the prisoner, aged 51, was placed at the bar, in order to challenge, if he thought proper, but no objection was made.

William Read was then indicted, for that he, on the day named, did incite and procure one Wm. Simpson, to feloniously and maliciously cast away and destroy a certain vessel, called the Colma, on the high sea, within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty of England, and also of the Central Criminal Court, with intent to prejudice divers persons as part owners of or underwriters to the said vessel. There were several other counts, varying the form in one of which the captain (Simpson) was charged as a principal in the felony. The prisoner pleaded "Not guilty."—The counsel for the prosecution were Messrs Clarkson, C. Jones, and Bodkin. Mr. Sergeant Shea and Mr. Doane appeared for the defence. Mr. Frederick Secretary deposed that he is superintendent of the Alliance Marine Insurance Company, and proved that on the 17th July, 1840, an insurance was effected on a vessel called the Colina, for £1200. G. Pooley examined: I am clerk in the banking-house of Barnett, Hoare, and Co. I was clerk in the bank of Alexander and Co., at Ipswich, in July and August, 1841. On the 3rd of August, in consequence of instructions, I transferred, or credited, the prisoner with the sum of £7248 12s. 6d.—Mr. V. J. Noss produced a copy of the register of the Colina, containing the names of the owners, and among them that of the prisoner was enrolled, and that of Enos Page.—By Mr. Sergeant Shea: I cannot swear that the bond herein named is Mr. Read the prisoner.—The bill of sale of the Colma was here put in and read, by which it appeared that she was built at Prince Edward's Island in 1821, and the sale effected in Mar. 1840, by Messrs. Rose, and Gutcheon and Spawers, stating that in July, 1840, Mr. Read (the prisoner) employed him to put up the brig Colina for sale; had previously received a note, signed "Gardiner," to keep a reserve bidding of £6,000. Had been unwilling that amount was offered by the bidders. If that sum had been bidden she would have been sold.—John Brady, examined by Mr. C. Jones—The witness deposed: I am a mariner, and live at Barking, and am in business in the coal-factory. In June, 1841, I commanded a smack called the Sarah on the coast of Holland. Other vessels were in company near the Brown Bank. I was roused out of my berth by the watch, and, on going on deck, I saw the Colina about six miles off. She appeared to be deserted by her crew. There was no signal of distress; weather fine. I neared her very soon, and got within half-a-mile of her when she went down. I put the crew on board the John Bull smack, bound for London. The crew did not appear to be fatigued by pumping, but quite "fresh." Captain Simpson made me a present of the long-boat. I believe, from the state of the wind and weather, the vessel might have been saved.—By Mr. Doane: She was on the eastern edge of the Brown Bank. There was a good breeze all night. I have myself lost a vessel belonging to my employers, which ran into a sunken vessel. I circulated a report that the Colina was missing, which was published.—By Mr. James Meule: That report was untrue. I did it to break the matter to my employers before I got home. I lost my clothes, and my wages, and share of the cargo.—Mr. Smith, jun., was next called, and proved the copy of the Colina go down "how foremost." After giving some minor details, a letter was put into the hands of the witness, which he admitted to be his handwriting. It was put in and read by the Clerk of the Court. The following is a copy of the letter alluded to, and which was considered by all parties an important document:—

"Barking, Essex, June 29, 1841.

"Sir,—I conceive it a duty to the public and the fishery at large, to acquaint you, as being the owner of the brig Colina of Ipswich, which was sunk off the coast of Holland some short time since, that I intend to acquaint the Insurance Company that I can produce sufficient evidence that the brig was sunk purposely. I am well acquainted with all the circumstances of the case, and I merely inform you of the fact before legal proceedings are commenced, that you may institute proper inquiries respecting it. Advice has been had on the subject, and legal gentlemen say that it is as strong a case as the Dryad, so recently reported in the papers. I shall wish your answer by return of post. If I do not receive an answer by Friday morning, I shall immediately commence. I am, yours respectfully, W. Smith, jun.

"Anchor Inn, 9 o'clock, Tuesday Morning.

"To Mr. Read, shipbuilder, Ipswich, Essex."

Witness (in continuation)—I received an answer, which my father opened and read. It was from a person of the name of Cobbs. It stated that the charge I had made was a grave one, and if I could not find substantiate it I should be called upon to answer it. I heard nothing more about it. I did not write to the Insurance Company.—By Mr. Sergeant Shea: I wrote to the prisoner, because I thought there had been some foul play. I did not write to the company, because my father forbade me not. I do not know what legal gentleman said that "the case was as strong a one as that of the Dryad." I do not know that any legal gentleman gave such an opinion. I did not obtain money from the Insurance Company. I was not employed by Mr. Rosslyn, a timber merchant, who charged me with embezzlement and turned me away.—Three other witnesses gave similar evidence as to the sinking of the vessel.—George Gardiner, clerk to Messrs. Read: I was in the employ of the prisoner, first as mate, and then commander of the Colma. After making a voyage, and returning to Ipswich, I told Mr. Read that the vessel was leaky, and I was afraid he would be lost, for I began pumping as soon as I got to sea. He said he would get her repaired. When I told the prisoner about the vessel, he said, "It's a bad job you did not sink her." He also said that, "If she had gone down she should have gone down with her." (The witness gave his evidence in a very mumbling manner, so that he was at length placed on a bench near the Judge.) The prisoner told me that I must make a voyage to Rotterdam for a cargo of coals to Rotterdam. I told him that she was not in a fit condition for it. The prisoner determined on her going. I sailed from the north towards Rotterdam. When they neared the Brown Bank she was 6 ft. 6 in. by W. On Wednesday morning I saw several fishing-smacks about three miles from me. After I had been some time in my berth I got up and went into the cabin. I cut away a piece of plank and turned the water in. She then began to settle, and the water was in. After I had done this I waited half an hour below, and then I called the mate and told him the vessel had sprung a leak, and that the water was running under my bedstead. I ordered the mate to the pumps, and they pumped half an hour. I told the mate we had better leave her, and we put out the long boat. The crew took their clothes and I took mine. After we got into the boat we lay too, near the stern of the vessel, an hour and a half. At length a vessel took us up, and then we were put on board a smack, to the owner of which I gave the long-boat. We were conveyed to London by the John Bull steamer. When I got to Ipswich I told Read all about it, and he told me not to give the particulars to Mr. Alexander.—It being now five o'clock the Court adjourned the further inquiry to ten o'clock on Thursday morning.

SECOND DAY (THURSDAY).

The learned judge took his seat at ten o'clock, when the jury were called over.

Wm. Simpson was cross-examined by Mr. Sergeant Shea. He said I don't think that I told anything to any one until March, 1843. In "43" Mr. Page questioned me as to the fate of the Colma having been sunk on purpose. I said to him (Page) that there was no truth in the story, for it was quite accidental. The vessel was rather deep in the water, in consequence of her heavy cargo. I bored the holes about three feet under water. It was done with a two-inch auger. I am unable to say what diameter such an auger would produce; probably about one inch and a quarter. I called the mate down to find out the leak. He did not go down. When I was asked if I knew anything that I threatened to be revenged on Read for dismissing me from the Ranger. I must have been intoxicated at the time if I said, "Read shall never build another vessel at Ipswich, if I can help it." This (a letter handed to him) is my handwriting. (Put in and read.)

"Newcastle, Jan. 4, 1844.

"Sir,—I received your letter this morning, dated the 31st, and glad to know the particulars of what was stated. I can assure you that I never said to any one that I was paid to lose the Colma, nor that I had lost her purposely, or that I had been remunerated here or since. The money drawn from the bank I sent from Barking; but, sir, I can clear you of the report and myself likewise. I expect to land next Saturday, and, if so, I am in hopes that I shall be at home in a few days, and get all these false reports settled, and proved to be false."

I am, sir, yours, &c.,

"To E. Page, Esq., Ipswich. W. Simpson."

Cross-examination continued by Mr. Sergeant Shea.—I did say that I had sunk the Colina purposely, and afterwards wrote the letter which has just been read. The case for the prosecution having closed, Mr. Sergeant Shea addressed the jury for the prisoner. Witnesses were then called for the defence. Mr. Hudson, surveyor of the highest respectability. Mr. Clarkson replied. Mr. Justice Maule summed up, and the jury, without a moment's consultation, pronounced a verdict of "Not Guilty." Loud plaudits proceeded from the audience, on hearing the decision.

SENTENCE ON CAPTAIN SIMPSON. The prisoner Simpson was then brought to the bar, and, having pleaded guilty to having sunk the ship, was asked whether he had anything to say why sentence should not be passed upon him according to law? The prisoner replied, "I have spoken nothing but the truth."—The learned Judge told him that he stood convicted, on his own confession, of a very heinous offence, and he had much aggravated it by an attempt to implicate and jeopardise the lives of others. "You are either guilty of the crime of perjury, which is not so punishable as that of casting away a vessel," said his lordship, "or you have, in reality, sunk the ship."—Prisoner: I did so, my lord. Mr. Justice Maule: Your case is one in which I can see no mitigating circumstances. The sentence of the Court, therefore, is, that you be transported beyond the seas for the term of your natural life.

(Before Mr. Justice Maule.)

MURDER.—At two o'clock the learned Judge entered the court, when Mary Furley, a married woman, 36 years of age, was indicted for the wilful murder of George Furley, her male child, in the month of March last, by carrying him and casting him into a certain navigable canal. The case for the prosecution was stated by Mr. Prendergast, and the prisoner was undefended; but the presiding judge adopted the good old-fashioned plan of being counsel. Several witnesses were examined, and the purport of their testimony has already appeared before the public. The prisoner was called on for her defence. She addressed the jury for nearly a quarter of an hour. She said the barber to the workhouse, when half drunk, operated on the head of her elder child, and cut pieces of flesh or skin therefrom as big as farthing pieces. In addition to 6s. she had when she left the workhouse, her friends made some small contributions to enable her to get employment at shirt-making, but she could, with hard labour, only finish three in a day, for which she received seven farthings each. The day before she went to the water she determined on laying out her little stock of money in mutton and rabbit, to make up some caps, but when she got to the shop to make the purchase, she found that some person had stolen her green silk purse and money. After a short pause and considerable faltering, she added—"My lord, I had no prospect before me but to go to the workhouse, to which I had such an aversion, that I preferred death to myself and child." She concluded by saying—"I did not go into the water, but slipped off the plank at the wharf."—Mr. Justice Maule summed up the evidence, and left it for the jury to say whether they thought, after the declarations made by the prisoner, she had wilfully cast herself and child into the water, or whether she had slipped in by accident, as she had just said? The jury consulted ten minutes, and declared her guilty. The Judge addressed the prisoner with great earnestness, and concluded by passing sentence of death, which was received by the prisoner all together, and exclaimed—"What shall I do?" She was removed from the bar in an agony of grief.

SURREY SESSIONS.

(Before Thomas Puckle, Esq., and a full Bench of Justices.)

DARING ROBBERY IN THE BOROUGH-ROAD.—James Gearing, a man of a most ferocious aspect, and the leader of a gang of thieves who infest the Borough-road and the Elephant and Castle, was indicted for feloniously stealing from the person of Martha Davis, on the 29th of March last, in the parish of St. George the Martyr, the sum of £7 7s. 6d., the property of her husband. She was surrounded in the street by the prisoner and his companions. The jury found a verdict of "Guilty," and the prisoner was sentenced to ten years' transportation.

Thomas Kitt, aged forty-four, a stone-mason, was charged with feloniously stealing, at Newington, a quantity of pavement stones, the property of the Commissioners of a certain trust, called the Great Dover-street Road Trust.—The prisoner apologised to the learned counsel at the bar for conducting his own defence. He appeared with a voluminous brief, and proceeded to take an objection to the indictment, cross-examined the witnesses for upwards of an hour, addressed the chairman as "the enlightened and worthy judge," made an exceedingly long address to the jury, said he had been seven times remanded, and, as the police had removed two shillings for every remand, they had made a good job of his case. The prisoner also remarked that jurymen in general were exceedingly stupid, but he perceived that he was fortunate enough to have twelve intelligent men to deal with, who would clearly understand his case, but told the Court, and the jury convict, he would bring a writ of error.—The jury found the prisoner "Guilty," and he was sentenced to nine months' imprisonment and hard labour, at Guildford.—The prisoner, on being removed, said he would effect an alteration in the law.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

HOLIDAYS FOR THE MILLION.

YOU SEE THIS BUSINESS WITH A SENSE AS COLD
AS IS A DEAD MAN'S NOSE.—SHAKSPEARE.

The great spring festivals of Cockaigne are Easter and Whitsuntide, the latter in especial, because, peculiar to it is that most marvellous saturnalia, whose parallel is not to be found in the round world—the Derby Day! In a less magnificent of a morning journal it was later, monumental that "we are a rich people," inasmuch as the income tax upon revenues of £150 and upwards, for the past year, averaged the national income at £200,000,000. However, as not one in five contributes that fund we is liable to underrate it, we may safely assume that the "respectable classes" of the country are just now striving to live upon an exchequer, something very like a thousand millions per annum. Under these circumstances it may be imagined that no individual happens to have overplus capital, and as at the present moment the interest of £100 Consols will not pay the hire of a job coach and et cetera to carry the principal from the City to Epsom, it is certainly doubtful how the latter is to get there. What to do with their money. However, then, indeed, a philanthropist, through the advertising columns of the Times, offers to assist unfortunate persons in the dilemma, but the terms of his speculation are not perplexing nor difficult to be provided for. How is it that we are without a company for supplying our mines and collieries with pure sunbeams to the cube foot, or an association for importing highly oxygenated atmosphere from the Andes, for the use of invalids, or to launch a palace, and paying fifty per cent? It would seem as if all enterprise were dead, had we not twice a week a bulletin, to remind us that Tattersall's is still in the land, together with returns of the speculation entered into by those Arees of Mercs—that is to say, Plutus. Presuming that the courteous reader, having paid his income tax (as becomes a proper patriot), has still, beyond his expenditure, much superfluous cash (in which case we permit him to read on in his own), we imagine him setting about a trifle of odds for Epsom. That he may do this, without becoming a laughing-stock to those who win, and his own aversion, we would take him to our Derby Day.

During the last few years a scheme for giving zest to some of our principal popular meetings, has sprung up in the shape of raring lotteries. These contrivances are (as the Yankees say) "a caution to the knowing ones," as courtesy now terms the old fashioned legs. For the amateur speculator they are infinitely the safest playthings. It is true they do not afford him facilities for hedging, and such like nice arrears, but as they do not expose him to certainties—constantly the result of doing business with "professionals." As we are on the eve almost of the great racing event of the metropolis—a race upon which an amount of money is deposited that would frighten a German principality—it may be well to illustrate what may come of the next Derby by what has taken place of the last St. Leger. As soon as the autumnal meetings of 1843 were over, there appeared from among the winners of their most influential two-year old stakes, the favourites for the great spring three year old stakes to be run for at Epsom. These were Rattan and the Ugly Buck. The former has shown this season—as we related in our last—very promisingly, and he is justly entered at 100 odds; at similar odds, or rather better indeed, is the Buck. Now we will suppose that the latter is beaten for the Two Thousand Guinea Stakes, on Tuesday next (if he goes for them), and down he drops in the market to 20 to 1. Well, Epsom races come off, and the Derby field, there is reason to know, contains but one or two good ones. The owner of Rattan cannot "get on" at favourable terms; therefore, he backs the Buck at 20 to 1, arranging with the proprietor to win with the latter only one or three suspicious fielders for £1000 a piece; run their two—win with the worst—and the public (knowing nothing of all these tactics) furnish forty or forty thousand pounds to make money for the successful generalship. This is consistent with the existing laws of the turf, and with its practice. Last year Cotherstone was backed by the public at odds against the Derby; it may be well to illustrate what Jerry Hawthorn might win it. Price-fighter would have won it had Nutwith been bought, as he might, for £1500, and the purity would have won nearly £70,000. To these perils the amateur letter is exposed, and to such he must be obnoxious so long as it is permitted that a race-horse may be sold with his engagements. The system of "play or pay" betting on the turf cannot, probably, without the jeopardy of the popular sport, be tampered with now. Let it be provided for by act of Parliament, that no stakes shall be recovered at law unless they are paid when a horse is named, and that the transfer of proprietorship forfeits all such engagements, and the turf would soon be purged from fertile sources of villany and trickery will be got rid of. The principle of turf speculation is now before the Legislature: a portion of its system or law have been submitted to public remark. Let it be hoped good may follow in each instance.

TATTERSALL'S.

MONDAY.—So little money was sent into the market in support of the field for the Derby, that we are led to conclude the public look upon the race as left to the two favourites; of course the outsiders are not worth some fifteen or twenty horses to the post to see that all is fair and above board, but beyond that they will have nothing to do with the matter, at least so says the betting, and he must be a bold man who will gainsay it. As we have intimated, nothing but the two cracks went down; Campanero certainly was backed at a premium on last week's price, and the fifties to one were taken rather freely about Qui Tam, but nothing else was any estimation. The Chester Cup betting was languor, and entirely without public interest.

A glance at the closing averages will show how slightly the positions of the Chester Cup and Derby favourites were affected by the business transacted this afternoon; indeed, beyond the advance of Red Deer, consequent on his Bath running, there was not a movement worth alluding to. The betting generally was beyond comparison dull for so advanced a period—will the ensuing week's racing mend it? We think not, albeit the Goodwood stable is to produce a mag for the 2000 Guineas that will test the Buck's pretensions for the Derby.

DRURY-LANE.

The new ballet produced at this house on Monday evening last, entitled "Henrietta, or the Statute Fair," presented some novelties, some of which were startling in the extreme—but certainly in the most delightful was the first appearance of Mdlle. Lucille Grahn; who is a danseuse of the first quality. She possesses graces combined with activity, and bids fair to rival the most popular favourites of the day. Of the ballet itself, we cannot say much; it may have proved at the Academie Royale de Musique, at Paris, a pleasant spectacle, but it "won't do" here, and we are quite surprised to see such a misrepresentation of the little river-side "oppidulum" (as Cicero says) like that presented for Greenwich. Mr Grieve ought to have known better. M. Silvian (or rather Mr. Sullivan from Cork) had an incumbering part, but when he had an opportunity, danced gracefully. The music, by three distinct composers, was rather pretty, but not always well allied to its subject.

SHIPPING INTELLIGENCE.

SHIPWRECK OF THE WILBERFORCE.—The surmises lately entertained relative to the fate of this splendid vessel are, we regret to say, too well founded, and that she was lost in the early part of February last, on the coast of Africa. The letters received are dated Feb. 6, from which it appears that on the 2nd of that month the Wilberforce was proceeding on a cruise along the Gambia, when, at about ten o'clock at night, the air bright and clear, the officers and crew were alarmed by the vessel striking heavily upon apparently a sunken rock, which subsequently proved correct, it being situate on the east side of the Dog Islands. As a precaution to save the lives of all on board, Lieut. Moore had the paddle-box life boats got afloat in case of necessity, and then every exertion was directed to get the ship off the rocks; her guns were thrown overboard, also her cables, anchors, shot, and stores: but, notwithstanding, she became a total wreck, and by the following day it was found that the vessel was completely settled on the island, and the edge of the rock was protruding through her bottom, and she was half full of water. Her masts and all the rigging were taken out of her, as well as a portion of her materials, but still she remained as firm as before, consequently will become a total wreck. The Wilberforce was the largest vessel built for the Niger expedition, and was, we understand, upwards of 800 tons burden. When fitted out at Woolwich about three years since, she was the admiration of her Majesty and her royal consort Prince Albert, and also the King of Belgium, the Duchess of Kent, Duke of Cambridge, and, in fact, all the royal family and nobility, who at will be recollected visited the dockyard for the purpose of inspecting the vessel, and the other steamer built for the expedition. Her loss is stated to be to a very considerable extent.

MAURITIUS, Jan. 6.—The Hugh Mathie, from Calcutta, whilst at anchor at the Bell buoy, dragged her anchors, during a fresh gale at N.W., with a tremendous high sea and race of the tide, slipped her cables, and in attempting to get into the harbour ran on the reefs, bilged, and will be a total wreck; crew (except one) and passengers saved. The Bordeaux, from Bordeaux, parted her anchors and ran on the reefs, but is expected to be got off after discharging her cargo; crew saved. The Marcain, from Calcutta, dragged her anchors, slipped her cables, ran on shore on the reefs, and will be a total wreck; crew and passengers saved. The Malay, from Moulmen, dragged her anchors, drove on shore after cutting away all her masts, and will be a total wreck; crew saved.

LARGE IMPORTATIONS FROM INDIA, CHINA, &c.—The arrivals during the present week from India and China, have been unusually numerous. Since Sunday the following ships have arrived in the docks, viz.:—the Elleoborough, Close, from Calcutta; Essex, Captain Brewer, from Bengal; Herefordshire and Malabar, from Bombay; William Jardine, from China; Cynthia, Captain Tyrburst, from Batavia; Lady Emma, from the Mauritius; Euxine, Capt. M'Millan, from Bombay; H. Walker, Captain Shanks, from Manilla; Goshawk, Captain Richie, from the Mauritius; Sussex, Captain Hammer, from the South Seas, and Tropic, Captain Robertson, from Robart Town, all with valuable cargoes. Several other ships from the Mauritius, &c., for London, passed through the Downs on Tuesday and Wednesday mornings.

LOSS OF THE BRIG FRANCIS.—We have received letters from Ilfracombe announcing the loss of the brig Francis, of Whitehaven, from Baltze, in the Bay of Honduras, last from the Cove of Cork, and bound to London, which took place on the night of Tuesday, by the vessel running ashore at Marlhoe Barnstaple about six miles to the westward of the coastguard station at Ilfracombe. The brig is laden with a cargo of mahogany and dyewood, and is so much embedded among the rocks that in all probability are long she will go to pieces. At about midnight on Wednesday, at least two hundred wreckers, of a most desperate character, made their appearance on the beach to plunder the wreck, however, their motives being communicated to Lieut. John Coleman, the chief officer at the Ilfracombe coastguard station, he met them with his small party of men and drove them back, but not before they had a severe conflict, in which the wreckers got the worst of it. The vessel is reported to be fully insured. All hands were saved.

The ship Northumberland, Captain Drew, which left Calcutta on the 19th of December and the Sandheads on the 14th, arrived at Brighton roads on Monday, and landed the following passengers:—Major Chapman, 30th Bengal Native Infantry; Lieut. Felrie, 18th Bengal Native Infantry; Mr. Boyer, Mrs. Adams and family, and Mrs. Captain Taylor and family. Amongst the passengers on board were, Captain Seaton, Lieut. Nelson, and Madras Native Infantry; Mr. Bell, Mr. Brewer Mrs. Ballant and son, and Mrs. Crisp. The Northumberland, after putting the passengers on board a pilot boat, set sail for the Downs. The ship Pauline Houghton, Captain Rotsey, laden with sugar, also arrived from the Mauritius, and landed letters, which were dispatched immediately, per railway, to London.

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

ACCIDENT AT THE DOVER RAILWAY TERMINUS.—It is the intention of Messrs. FOX and Henderson, the contractors, to pay the whole of the injured men their full wages, until they are enabled to return to work; as also the funeral expenses of the unfortunate man May.

CRIME INSTIGATED BY A POLICEMAN.—At the West Sussex Quarter Sessions, held at Petworth on Saturday, the Duke of Richmond brought forward a charge against a man named Hack, who had for nearly fifteen years filled the office of paid constable for the parish of Washington and the adjoining parishes. A man had on the previous Thursday been sentenced to be imprisoned and whipped as an incorrigible rogue and vagabond, he having been thirteen times before an inmate of the Petworth House of Correction; and the prisoner deposed that the act for which he was taken (snaring game) was instigated by Hack, who gave him the wires and a knife to set them with. An investigation took place into the circumstances, which ended in a full corroboration of the prisoner's statement, and the result was, that the prisoner was discharged, and the constable was dismissed.

DESTRUCTIVE FIRE AT LIMEHOUSE.—On Monday morning, shortly after three o'clock, the neighbourhood of North-street, Limehouse-fields, was alarmed by an extremely raised cry of fire; and, upon inquiry, it appeared that the premises of Mr Dunmore, pork-butcher, situate in that street, were wholly in flames. Shortly after the alarm had been given the engines from Schoolhouse-lane, Wellclose-square, and Jeffery's-square arrived, and were promptly put in service; but the flames had obtained such an ascendancy, that notwithstanding the prompt efforts of the firemen, the fire was not quelled until Mr. Dunmore's premises had been reduced to a heap of ruins. Mr. Dunmore is fortunately insured in the Sun and Imperial offices. It is not known how the fire originated.

ATTEMPTED SUICIDE IN ST. JAMES'S PARK.—Sunday afternoon, between three and four o'clock, a married female, named Mary Shoulder, of No. 29, Whitcomb-street, Leicester-square, threw herself into the ornamental water in the enclosure in St. James's-park, near the residence of the keeper. The latter, on being made acquainted with the circumstance, instantly repaired to the spot, and, with a rake, succeeded in dragging her ashore as she was sinking a second time in deep water. She was conveyed to Westminster Hospital, and was next day enabled to leave the institution. Distress is the cause assigned.

FIVE HUNDRED POUNDS LOST.—Mr. George Horlick, of Cranham, in Gloucestershire, lost from his pocket, on Thursday last, as he believes, in Cheltenham fair, the large sum of five hundred pounds, £500 of which was the Gloucestershire Banking Company's £10 notes, £100 in Bank of England paper, and £100 in sovereigns. He had drawn the amount out of the Gloucestershire bank the same morning, and imprudently carried it about his person.

EXTENSIVE FIRE IN CLERKENWELL.—Between two and three o'clock on Wednesday morning a most destructive fire broke out upon the premises, No. 5, Upper Rosoman-street, Clerkenwell. It appears that the building, which is three stories in height, is let out in tenements to three different persons, and that there were no less than fourteen individuals upon the premises at the moment of the outbreak. The poor creatures were one by one rescued from the fire, which, in the course of a few minutes, had increased with frightful rapidity, leaving the inmates no opportunity of saving anything except their lives. The light of the fire illuminated the whole of the city, and hundreds of people hastened to witness its progress. We are glad to state that no lives were lost, nor was any one in the least injured.

INCENDIARISM.—Tuesday's Government Police Gazette contains the offer of a reward of £100 for the discovery and apprehension of the person or persons who, on the evening of the 8th instant, wilfully and maliciously set fire to the premises of Richard Lacey, Esq., situated near the Wheatsheaf, at Brentree, in the county of Essex, by which considerable damage was done before the flames could be extinguished. Her Majesty's most gracious pardon is offered to any accomplice, not being the person who actually fired the premises, who will furnish the necessary information.

WOOD-ENGRAVING:

ITS HISTORY AND PRACTICE.

BY

WILLIAM ANDREW CHATTO.

ORIGIN OF WOOD-ENGRAVING. OLD WOOD-CUTS AND BLOCK-BOOKS IMPRESSED BY MEANS OF FRICTION.

WOOD-ENGRAVING, as an art, has long been brought into genera use throughout Europe as a mode of illustrating books, for which it has been adopted in consequence of the degree to which it unites beauty of effect with facility of production, when compared with engraving on copper or steel; it has also, although very recently, been made a yet more ready ally of the press, for the purpose of "Illustrating" the "News" of the day, giving the "very age and body of the time, its form and pressure:" an end which could only have been accomplished by an art capable of being used in conjunction with type and the steam engine, and yet possessing in itself beauty enough to be ornamental and attractive. Wood-engraving, in the perfection to which it has been brought by modern artists, has presented all these advantages, and that they have been used in a liberal and discriminating spirit, we trust that the pages of the "ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS" have borne sufficient testimony. Our endeavours having been crowned with the most signal success, we have imagined that it would be but a just tribute to the art that preceded and introduced printing, and which is now so powerful an assistant to its efforts, if we were to give to the public a sketch of the origin, progress, and modern practice of wood cutting, illustrated with cuts, showing the state of the art at different periods, its origin, its decline, its revival, and its present condition. This sketch we have thrown into the form of a SUPPLEMENT, which we hope will not be deemed by our readers a gift unsuitable to the general plan of our journal, or unworthy to accompany it.

Wood-engraving, then, in the sense in which we propose to consider it, and as the term is generally understood, is the art of cutting figures on wood, for the purpose of their being impressed, in some colouring matter, upon paper. It differs in principle, and in its mode of operation, from engraving on copper and steel, in the circumstance of the lines which form the impression being left prominent in the wood —the adjacent parts being cut away—while, in engraving on copper or steel, the lines are either cut into the plate by means of a graver, or bit into it by means of a corrosive liquid, the adjacent surface remaining untouched. In wood-engraving the lights are cut out; in copperplate-engraving, they are left. The wood-engraver gets his black, by leaving such portions of his block, as are to appear so in the impression, untouched; while the copperplate-engraver, to obtain black, is obliged to make an incision in his plate.

From this difference between wood and copperplate-engraving in their mode of operation, arises the different manner of printing from a wood-block and from a copper-plate. Wood-blocks are printed in the same manner as letter-press; their prominent lines are covered with ink by means of balls or rollers, and the impression is formed by the paper being pressed on to them; while in steel or copper-plates, the incised or hollowed lines are filled with ink, and the surface being wiped clean, an impression is obtained by pressing the paper into the inked lines, an operation which is performed by means of a rolling-press. In an impression recently taken from a wood-block, the lines are slightly prominent at the back of the paper, in consequence of their having been pressed upon it in front; while in an impression from a copperplate, the lines are slightly indented at the back, in consequence of their having been pressed into the incisions of the plate in front.

The principle of engraving, both in relief or prominent lines, and in intaglio, or incised lines, for the purpose of stamping impressions on soft or yielding substances, was known to the ancient Egyptians at a very early period, as is proved by their rings and stamps, still existing.

The following cuts a reduced copy of an ancient Egyptian stamp, of wood, which was found at Thebes, and brought to England by E. W. Lane, Esq. It was probably used for stamping impressions on bricks when in a soft state. The characters express the name of an Egyptian King, "Amonoph, beloved of Truth," who is supposed to have been a contemporary of Moses. The characters which appear white in the engraving are those which are cut into the wood, and which would be prominent on the brick. The custom of stamping bricks in this manner was very general both with the Egyptians and ancient Babylonians.

The art of stamping money appears to have been known in Greece upwards of two thousand years before the art of printing books—which was derived from wood-engraving—was discovered and practised in Germany. There are, however, no sufficient grounds for believing that either the Egyptians, the Greeks, or the Romans applied their knowledge of engraving and stamping to the purpose of taking impressions on paper or similar substances, from wood blocks or plates of metal, in the manner of modern wood and copperplate-engravings. As the art of wood-engraving appears to have been practised in China from an early period, it has been supposed that it was introduced into Europe by some of the travellers who visited that country towards the latter part of the thirteenth century; but this supposition is not corroborated by any evidence, and rests merely on the fact that wood-engraving was practised in China before it was practised in Europe. Marco Polo, a Venetian, who lived for several years in China about the period above alluded to, appears to have paid but little attention to the wood-engraving and block-printing of the Chinese, for in the account of his travels he does not even mention them. It may here be remarked, that several other new applications of old well-known principles, suggested by man's natural reason and the wants of a progressing society, have in a similar manner been supposed to have been introduced from the East, as if Europeans could not, under similar circumstances, invent or combine as well as Asiatics.

ANCIENT SPANISH MONOGRAMS.

stamp; and there seems reason to believe that in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries Italian and German notaries used frequently to affix their official marks to instruments by means of a stamp. In a copy now lying before us of the proceedings of the Diet at Cologne, printed in 1513—for the purpose of being sent to the several magistracies and local courts of justice throughout the German empire, as modern acts of Parliament are sent to Clerks of the Peace—its authenticity is attested by the name of an official person, impressed at the end by means of a stamp.

There seems reason to conclude that wood-engraving was first applied to the representation of pictorial subjects, in the early part of the fifteenth century. One of its earliest known productions is a figure of St. Christopher, with the date 1423; and judging from the manner of its execution, it certainly cannot be considered as a first attempt. It is, in fact, much superior both in design and engraving to many of the cuts of similar subjects executed upwards of half a century later. This cut was discovered pasted in the inside of the cover of an old manuscript volume of prayers, belonging to the Carthusian monastery of Buxheim, in the diocese of Augsburg, and was probably designed and engraved by a German artist of the district. It is coloured by means of a stencil, the manner in which old playing cards were coloured; and it is a well established fact, that wood-engraving was carried on extensively by means of stencils by card-makers at Augsburg, in 1418. For the information of such of our readers as may not know what a stencil is, we think it necessary to explain the meaning of the word, as it is not to be found in "Johnson's Dictionary." a stencil is a piece of pasteboard, or a thin plate of metal, having figures or letters pierced through it, for the purpose of their being communicated to paper, parchment, linen, or any smooth flat surface, by means of a brush charged with colour, being passed over the stencil. We give a reduced copy of this celebrated old cut, which is now in the library of Earl Spencer, by whose father (the late Earl) it was purchased, at a high price, for the purpose of enriching his magnificent collection of old wood-cuts, block, and type-printed books, illustrative of the origin and progress of printing. In the same library are two other old cuts, coloured in the same manner, and supposed to have been executed about the same period. One of them, indeed—the Annunciation—was contained in the same volume as the St. Christopher, being pasted on the inside of the opposite cover. The subject of the other is St. Bridget, of Sweden, writing at a desk, with a pilgrim's staff, hat, and wallet, behind her —indicative of her pilgrimage to the Holy Land—and an inscription, in German, above her head, the meaning of which is, "O, Bridget pray to God for us." From the smoothness perceptible at the back of this cut, the impression has evidently been taken by means of friction with a rubber or burnisher, which appears to have been the usual mode of taking impressions from wood-blocks previous to the invention of the press.

Though St. Christopher be a purely imaginary character, he was yet regarded as a real saint in former times by the ignorant and superstitious, who believed that no sudden nor violent death should befall them, and that they should not die without absolution, on the day on which they should see his image or picture. To this popular superstition, the two Latin verses at the bottom of the cut relate:—

"Cristofori faciem die quacunque tuetur, Ilia nempe die morte mala non morietur."

"On the day that thou seest St. Christopher's face,
By no ill death shalt thou end thy race."

Molanus, a Catholic professor of Theology, at Lovain, condemns this superstition, in his "Treatise on Sacred Images and their abuse," published at Douay, in 1617. He says, the figure of St. Christopher used to be painted in halls and churches where it might be easily seen; and that he has heard of it being painted in many places in Germany, outside of the church, either at the entrance, or on the wall, the reason of its being so placed being explained by two verses, which he quotes, and which are the same as those under the old cut. The figure of St. Christopher was also supposed to have the power of preserving the house in which it was placed from all harm. It may not be out of place to remark here, that, in comparatively recent times, small wood-cuts of the "three Kings of Cologne" used to be sold as a security to travellers and other persons, against the perils of the road, head-ache, falling-sickness, fevers, sorcery, all kinds of witchcraft, and sudden death. Under each cut a few lines were printed, enumerating its virtues, and warranting that it had touched the heads of the THREE KINGS at Cologne—Caspar, Melchior, and Balthasar—who, according to "tradition," are the three Eastern Magi who offered gifts to the infant Jesus, at Bethlehem. One of those preservative billets was found in the pocket of a man named William Jackson, who was convicted, with six other smugglers, and hung at Chichester, in 1749, for the murder of two custom-house officers, named Chater and Galley.

The following account of St. Christopher, from the Golden Legend of Jacobus de Voragine, will sufficiently explain the cut. St. Christopher, who was a person of gigantic stature, betook himself, at the suggestion of a certain holy hermit, to the pious work of carrying pilgrims across a river. On one occasion he took up, as he supposed, a little boy, but who grew so heavy, that the Herculean saint, notwithstanding the support of a palm tree which he used as a staff, found great difficulty in reaching the opposite bank. Having landed, however, he thus addressed his passenger: "Boy, you placed me in great danger; for you weighed so heavy that if I had had the whole world on my back, I could scarcely have felt a greater weight." The answer which he received, informed him of the real character of the person whom he had mistaken for a mere mortal child: "Wonder not, Christopher, for not only have you had the whole world upon your shoulders, but also him who created the world."

It is very likely that the first professional wood-engravers were card-makers; and this is rendered more probable by the fact that wood-engravers were generally called card-painters—Briefmalers—in Germany, about the middle of the fifteenth century. They were also called Formschneiders—figure-cutters—in Germany, about the same period; and subsequently this term appears to have been more specifically applied to those who were chiefly employed in executing wood-cuts for the illustration of books, to distinguish them from those whose principal business was the engraving and colouring of cards. Till towards the year 1500, however, the terms Briefmaler and Formschneider appear to have been frequently used as synonymous. It may here be observed that the word Form, in the compound term Form-schneider, signifies the original form, model, pattern, or type, from which anything is made, and thus suggests the idea of an engraved block, from which numerous impressions could be taken. The word form is still used in a printing-office, to signify a quantity of types regularly arranged, and locked, or wedged up, within the quoins, ready to have impressions taken from them.

From an anecdote related of St. Bernardin of Sienna, a famous preacher, who died in 1444, and was canonized in 1450, it appears that the manufacture of playing cards was a regular business at Bologna, in 1423. When preaching there, in that year, against the vice of gaming, he inveighed so forcibly against the game of cards, in particular, to which the Bolognese were much addicted, that his hearers made a fire in the public place where he was preaching, and threw all their cards into it. A card-maker, who was present, and who had heard the denunciations of the saint, not only against the card-players, but also against those who supplied them with cards, thus addressed him, in great affliction of mind: "I have not learned, father, any other art but that of painting cards; and if you deprive me of that, you deprive me of life, and my destitute family of the honest means of gaining a living." To this appeal the saint cheerfully replied: "If you do not know what else to paint, paint this figure, and you will never have cause to regret having done so." Thus saying, he took a tablet, and drew on it a sun with its resplendent rays, having in the midst the name of Jesus, denoted by the sign I.H.S. The man followed the Saint's advice; and so numerous were the purchasers of the new work of art, that he soon became rich.

The following figure, copied from an old wood-cut, with the date 1454, preserved in the Royal Library at Paris, represents St. Bernardin displaying the same sacred symbol which he recommended to the card-painter of Bologna. It has been supposed that it was engraved with reference to the anecdote above related; but on this point our readers must decide for themselves. The original cut, which is coloured, is surrounded by a border, and contains four Latin verses, which it has been considered unnecessary to copy. It is executed in a curious manner: the engraver, wishing to express more than mere outline, has reduced the black, by cutting out a number of small circular spots, which give the cut the appearance of having been printed from a block that had been "honey-combed" by worms. Old wood-cuts executed in this manner are of rare occurrence.

In the year 1441 the company or fellowship of painters at Venice obtained an order from the magistracy, prohibiting the introduction of foreign manufactured cards, and stamped or printed coloured figures, under the penalty of a fine of xxx liv. xii soldi, and the forfeiture of the articles. This order appears to have been made on the petition of the company of painters, representing that "the art and mystery of making cards and stamped figures, which were practised in Venice, had fallen into total decay, in consequence of the great quantities of foreign playing-cards and stamped coloured figures which were brought into the city." As the word stamped—stampide—appears to refer to impressions from a wood-block, it seems likely that the stamped coloured figures were wood-engravings of saints of the same kind as the "St. Christopher," the "Virgin," and "St. Bridget," and coloured in a similar manner, by means of a stencil.

It is highly probable that the Prenters of Antwerp—who appear to have been associated in a company or fellowship with the Painters, Statuaries, Stone-cutters, Glass-makers, and Illuminators of books, in 1442—were wood-engravers and printers of coloured figures. It is certain that they were not printers in the modern sense of the word; for though Gutemberg had already made some experiments in typography, at Strasburg, the art was not then known at Antwerp, nor indeed so far perfected as to be practically available, for the purpose of book-printing, in any other place. When typography was subsequently introduced into Holland, from Germany, its professors were not called Prenters, but Boek-drukkers, that is, Book-pressmen.

Although the earliest professional card-makers might generally impress the outlines of the figures from engraved wood blocks, it is certain that they also were accustomed to form the outlines by means of a stencil. The old cards in the print-room of the British Museum, which are probably the oldest, of their kind, in existence, and of a date not later than 1440, are executed in this manner. They were discovered in the back of an old book, forming what are called the "boards," and were purchased for the Museum by Mr. Josi, the keeper of the prints, of Messrs. Paul and Dominic Colnaghi. The following cut of the knave of hearts, is a faithful copy of one of those old stencilled cards.

OLD PLAYING-CARD. 15TH. CENTURY.

From the execution of such cuts as the St. Christopher, containing, besides the figures, only a line or two of explanatory engraved text, the next important application of the art of wood-engraving was the execution of what are now generally called block books, that is, books consisting of pictorial subjects and explanatory text impressed entirely from engraved wood-blocks. Small grammatical primers, such as the "Donatus," and the "Grammaticale Alexandri Galli," were also entirely engraved on wood; but though fragments of such school-books are to be found in several great libraries, both in England and on the continent, it is believed that no complete copy has come down to our times.

The three principal block-books, properly so called, and most frequently referred to by writers on bibliography, are—1. The "Apocalypsis, seu Historia Sancti Johannis;" 2. The "Historia Virginis ex Cantico Canticorum;" and, 3, the book generally called "Biblia Pauperum." The first, of which there are six editions known, is a history of the principal events in the life of St. John, partly derived from tradition, together with subjects from the Revelations; the second, of which there are two editions, is an allegorical history of the Virgin, as supposed to have been prefigured in Solomon's song; and the third consists of a comparison of certain types, or prefigurations of "The Old Testament," with their supposed anti-types, or accomplishments, in "The New Testament." Of this work there are five editions known with the text in Latin; and two, more recent, of the date 1470 and 1475, with the text in German. There are also two editions of it, one Latin and the other German, with the text printed from moveable types, by Albert Pfister, at Bamberg, about 1462. In all those works the cuts, with the explanatory text, are impressed on one side of the paper only; and where opportunity for examination has been afforded, it has generally been observed that the impressions have been taken by means of friction. The ink is a kind of distemper, which yields to water, usually of a sepia or umber colour. In order that the cuts and text might follow each other like the pages of a book, without any intervening blanks, the blank sides were pasted together. In what year or in what country those books were first executed, has been much debated among bibliographers; and the suppositions and assertions that have been put forth on the subject, are, in proportion to the evidence adduced, as a gallon of sack is to a halfpenny-worth of bread. From all that has been advanced, the least objectionable conclusion seems to be that the earliest editions were executed some time between 1430 and 1450; that the first editions of the "Historia Sancti Johannis," and the "Biblia Pauperum," were the work of German artists; and that the second edition of the "Historia Virginis"—wherever the first may have appeared—was executed either in Holland or in Flanders.

Of the cuts which appear in those block-books, it may be observed that they are generally superior in design to most of the cuts which appear in books printed from moveable types previous to 1490. Though the figures often display incorrect drawing, yet their action is sometimes very well expressed; and the drapery is generally "well cast," more especially in the female figures in the history of the Virgin. Shade is usually indicated by a series of short parallel lines, but no lines crossing each other at oblique angles, and forming what is now termed "cross-hatching" are introduced. It has been said that cross-hatchings were first introduced in the cuts to the Nuremberg Chronicle, published in 1493; but the assertion is not correct, for cross-hatchings are to be perceived in the frontispiece to "Breydenbach's Travels," a work printed at Mentz in 1486.

In the "Introduction to the Critical Study of the Scriptures, by the Rev. T. H. Horne, B.D."—a work of much greater repute than authority, not only as regards art, but also on questions of theology and sacred criticism—the following most erroneous statement respecting the so-called Biblia Pauperum appears:—"It is a manual or kind of catechism of the Bible for the use of young persons and the common people, whence it derives its name of Biblia Pauperum, 'the Bible of the Poor,' who were thus enabled to acquire, at a comparatively low price, an imperfect knowledge of some of the events recorded in Scripture." This account proves that the writer neither knew the meaning of the title "Biblia Pauperum," as applied to the work in question, nor was acquainted with the state of the common people in the fifteenth century, both as regards their means of purchasing and capability of reading, such a book. The title "Biblia Pauperum," as given to this book, did not mean the "Bible of the Poor" in general, but signified the Bible of the poor Preachers, that is, poor preaching mendicant friars, but more especially those of the Franciscan order, as might be proved by many instances of the restricted meaning of the word "Pauperum" in the titles of books not only of that period, but of both earlier and subsequent times; one instance, however, need only be cited: St. Bonaventura, who lived in the thirteenth century, wrote a work intended for the use of his own order, the Franciscan, which is entitled "Biblia Pauperum." The work under consideration was never intended for the laity of any class, and it most certainly never was a book which could be acquired by the poor at a comparatively low price; and even if it could, they would have been unable to read it, seeing that the text is in cramped abbreviated Latin, unless, indeed, it be presumed that they were more learned than most of the clergy of the period.

Among the several other early block-books, an alphabet, formerly belonging to Sir George Beaumont, who bequeathed it to the British Museum; and a work entitled "Exercitium Super Pater-noster," formerly belonging to the Cathedral Church of Tournay, but now in the public library at Mons, seem most deserving of notice here; each copy of those books is unique in its kind; and the cuts of both may be ranked with the best of the period to which they belong, both with regard to design and execution.

Sir George Beaumont's Alphabet is about the size of a modern duodecimo: there is only one cut on each leaf, and from the smooth appearance of the blank sides, which are not pasted together, as in most block-books, it is evident that the impressions have been taken by means of friction, and not by a press. Most of the letters are composed wholly of human figures, though in a few, animals are introduced, both for the sake of variety, and to complete the form of the letter. They are impressed in a sepia-coloured ink; the greater part of the letter A is torn out; and the letters S, T, and V, are wanting. At the end of the volume is a beautifully designed ornament, consisting of flowers and foliage. The late Mr. W. Y. Ottley, in a manuscript catalogue, in the Print Room of the British Museum, thus describes the volume, and gives his opinion of its date, and of the country of the artist:—"Alphabet of initial letters composed of grotesque figures, wood engravings of the middle of the fifteenth century, apparently the work of a Dutch or Flemish artist." With respect to the date, we are of Mr. Ottley's opinion; but do not agree with him about the appearance of their being the work of a Dutch or Flemish artist. Mr. Ottley was too fond of ascribing, without sufficient evidence, such old wood-cuts to Dutch and Flemish artists, to the prejudice of Germans, as he could not, without glaring injustice, assign to his favourite Italians. From a brief inscription in French on one of the cuts, the letter K, of which we give a fac-simile, as a specimen of the work, and from the general character of the whole it is more likely that they were designed either in France or England by a native artist, than in Germany or Holland: from some writing at the beginning of the volume, there can be no doubt of its having belonged to an Englishman so early as the reign of Henry VIII. The words of the brief inscription alluded to are, "mon . . . avez," with a heart—which is to be read as a rebus for the word cœur—between them; and the figure kneeling and pointing to the label is thus supposed to address his mistress, to whom he is at the same time offering a ring, "Mon cœur avez,"—Thou hast my heart. On the principle of "suum cuique," we cheerfully acknowledge that we owe this amended reading to an article on wood-engraving in the "Gentleman's Magazine," for August, 1839, although the writer of it appears to have paid no regard to the principle himself, but to have most unceremoniously given to John Nokes what belonged to Richard Styles. such conduct was not gentlemanly anywhere; and least of all in the "Gentleman's Magazine."

The "Exercitium super Pater-noster," or Exercise on the Lord's Prayer, is, as we have already observed, unique; and the only writers who have noticed it, so far as we know, are Santander, who, in the second volume of his "Dictionnaire Bibliographique," gives a brief general account of the book, with a detailed explanation of the several cuts; and the Rev. T. H. Horne, who borrowed his information from Santander. It is of folio size, and the substance of Santander's general account of it is as follows:—"A precious monument of the art of wood engraving, and the more interesting as no bibliographer has mentioned it; it has even escaped the researches of Heineken, who has given a most curious and detailed account of all the block-books which he had been able to discover in the richest literary depositories of Europe. This little work, which bears the marks of the highest antiquity, consists of ten wood-cuts, printed on only one side of the paper, with the text, or short explanation, at the top of each." Santander, however, has omitted to mention for what reason we shall and Gutemberg contributing the knowledge. Subsequently, Peter not venture to suppose—that, besides the explanation, in Latin, at the top of each cut, there is also an explanation, in Flemish, at the bottom. Referring such of our readers as may wish to read a detailed explanation of the rest of the cuts, to Santander's "Dictionnaire," tom. ii., p. 402, we shall content ourselves with giving a fac-simile and explanation of the fifth cut, which relates to the passage, "Fiat voluntas tua sicut in Cœlo, et in terra"—"Thy will be done in earth, as it is in Heaven." (See next page.)

At the top of the cut, on the left, are seen the friar, who is to be instructed in prayer, and his angelic instructor, on their knees before the Almighty. To the right is an angel, with a label in his hand, containing the inscription, "Qui stat videat ne cadat"—"Let him who stands take heed that he does not fall;" and in the centre is a figure with the inscription, "Bonus Christianus: Gratia Dei sum id quod sum"—"The good Christian: by God's grace I am what I am." To this character the warning, "Let him who stands take heed, &c.," is more particularly addressed, as his confidence in divine grace may easily slide into too high an opinion of his own merits. Towards the bottom of the cut, to the left, are three figures representing the Jews —"Judæi"—with the inscription, "Quis est Jesus filius fabri ?"—"Who is Jesus, the carpenter's son?" To the right are three other figures, representing the Pagans—"Pagani"—who are saying, "Quis vr. deus. est. ?"—"But who is the Lord?" In the centre are two figures, representing those bad people who merely profess to be Christians, "Mali Christiani"—with the inscription, "Ducamus in bonis dies nostros"—"Let us live among the good." Such nominal Christians, though living among the good, yet are not of them.

OF THE INVENTION OF TYPOGRAPHY, OR THE ART OF PRINTING FROM MOVEABLE LETTERS, AND THE INVENTION OF THE PRINTING-PRESS.

The difficulty and tediousness of cutting the letters in the text o the old block-books, and a perception of the advantages that might be derived from printing books—for which there was already, in the earlier part of the fifteenth century, a great and increasing demand from moveable letters, which, after having been used to compose the text of one book, might be distributed, and re-composed for the text of another, suggested the invention of typography; while the slowness and inconvenience of the method of taking impressions by means of friction, on one side of the paper only, suggested the invention of the printing-press.

The first attempts to render practicable those two distinct principles in the process of printing—namely, the setting up of the text in moveable letters, and the printing of it by means of a press—appear to have been made at Strasburg, about 1435, by the same individual, John Gutemberg, a German, of noble family, and a native of Mentz. The evidence of his having made such attempts is contained in the records of a suit instituted against him at Strasburg, in 1438 1439, by the two brothers of one of his partners in the "new invention;" and the evidence of his having at length succeeded in carrying his plans into effect, in conjunction with John Faust and Peter Scheffer, at Mentz, about 1450, is also contained in the record of another suit which was instituted against him by his partner, John Faust, at Mentz, in 1455. The evidence afforded by those records is confirmed by the account which the learned Trithemius gives of the first invention of typography, by Gutemberg, in his "Annales Hirsaugienses," a work which he finished in 1514. Trithemius says that he had his information about thirty years before, that is about 1484, from Peter Scheffer, who, by his invention of the mode of cutting punches and casting the types, contributed chiefly to the perfection of the art of printing, as then practised.

The object of the suit brought against Gutemberg at Strasburg in 1438, by George and Nicholas Drytzehn, was to compel him either to refund the money advanced to him by their late brother, Andrew Drytzehn, or to admit them as partners in his new invention in their brother's place. Though Gutemberg wished to keep this invention secret, and though it be not specifically named nor explained in the record of the suit, yet from the depositions of some of the witnesses, considered with reference to Gutemberg's subsequent connection with Faust and Scheffer, there can be no reasonable doubt of its having been a project for printing books from moveable types by means of a press.

From the evidence of the witnesses examined in this cause, the record of which is still preserved at Strasburg, it appears that Gutemberg was not only unwilling to admit the heirs of his deceased partner, Andrew Drytzehn, to occupy his place, but that he also wished to keep secret the "wonderful art," the working out of which appears to have been the chief object of the partnership. That this "wonderful art" was TYPOGRAPHY, or the art of printing, by means of a press, from moveable letters, appears to be clearly established by the following extracts from the evidence:—

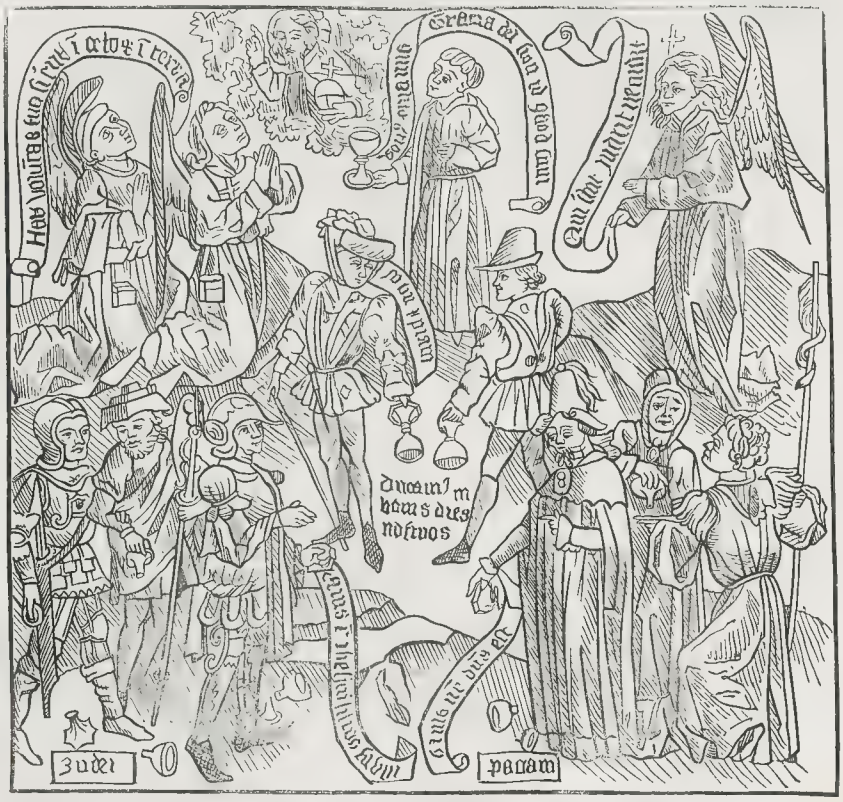
Lawrence Beildeck, Gutemberg's servant, deposes, that, after the death of Andrew Drytzehn, he was sent by his master to Nicholas Drytzehn, to request him not to show the press which he had in his house to any person, and that he, Beildeck, was further ordered by his master to undo the press, which was fastened with two screws, so that the "pieces" which were in it should separate or fall asunder, and afterwards so to put the pieces in the press that no person might understand them. Conrad Saspach, the person who made the press, received a similar order from Andrew Heilman, another one of Gutemberg's partners, and the terms in which it was conveyed—"Take the pieces out of the press and distribute them,"—are identical with the technical terms used by German printers to express the same operation in the present day. The word Stücke, literally translated "pieces," is used by German printers to signify the pages in a form—and the word zerlegen has still with them the same meaning as the word "distribute" has amongst English printers.

It has been stated that Gutemberg's first essays in the typographic art were made with wooden types: but though the assertion may be true, there appears to be good reason for concluding that his experiments at Strasburg, when in partnership with Drytzehn, were made with metal types; for it appears that a quantity of lead was purchased on account of the partnership; and Hans Dünne, a goldsmith, deposes that about three years previously, he had done work to the amount of a hundred guilders for Gutemberg on account of printing—trucken—alone. The goldsmiths of that period, it is to be observed, were also engravers, although their engravings were not executed for the purpose of taking impressions of them, but for the ornament of the articles on which they were made, such as gold and silver cups and other articles for the more wealthy of the laity, and censers, chalices and, more especially, paxes, for the service of the church. As Hans Dünne, the goldsmith and engraver, had done so much work for Gutemberg on account of printing, it is difficult to conceive on what he could have been employed, unless it were in cutting letters, and those letters too of metal, as is rendered probable from the fact of the purchase of lead.

The decision of the judges in the suit instituted against Gutemberg by the brothers of his deceased partner affords no additional facts relative to the origin of printing. It was simply to this effect: that as, by the articles of partnership, Gutemberg was bound to repay a hundred florins to Andrew Drytzehn's heir in the event of his death, but as eighty-five florins of the capital which Andrew Drytzehn was to have brought in remained unpaid, Gutemburg was to pay the balance of fifteen florins to George and Nicholas Drytzehn; and when this sum was paid, they were to have no further claim to a partnership. This decision is dated 12th December, 1439.

From the evidence adduced, it appears that as early as 1436, Gutemberg had conceived the idea of the "wonderful art," from which he expected to derive great profits, but which appears to have enriched him only with posthumous fame; and that at the time of his partner's death, which happened about the 27th of December, 1438, he had made such progress towards the completion of his plan as to have a press constructed, and certain "pieces," or pages, of letter set up. What further progress he made in his invention at Strasburg, or whether he succeeded there in rendering it practically available for the purpose of printing books, is unknown; for though there are several early typographic works still in existence which are supposed to have been printed by Gutemberg whilst making his first essays in the art at Strasburg, there is no certain evidence of the fact. Though it may be uncertain whether he printed any book at Strasburg or not, it seems almost certain that he had not succeeded there in rendering his invention profitably or conveniently practicable.

Gutemberg appears to have returned from Strasburg to his native city, Mentz, about 1444. Towards the latter end of that year he there entered into a partnership with John Faust, a goldsmith, for the purpose of printing books, Faust supplying the necessary capital



EXERCITIUM SUPER PATER-NOSTER.

Scheffer, who had been a writer, or clerk, became associated with them in their endeavours to perfect the art, not originally as partner in the concern, but as a person employed by Faust. Scheffer, who subsequently married Faust's daughter and succeeded him in the business, completed Gutemberg's idea, and removed the chief difficulty which impeded the easy application of the new art,—namely, the tediousness of cutting the form of every single letter,—by his invention of the method of cutting punches and casting the letters from matrices.

In 1455, Faust, apparently with the view of obtaining the entire control of the business, instituted a process against Gutemberg for the recovery of a sum of 2020 florins, including interest, on account of money which he had advanced, but which, it appears, had not all been expended on the printing establishment. Gutemberg, in his answer, demurred to a sum of 800 florins, as it had been expended in the purchase of printing materials, which were conditionally assigned to Faust as a security for the money. He objected also to the claim for interest, but declared that he was ready to render Faust an account of any other money which he had advanced. The decision of the judges was, however, against Gutemberg, who was required to repay to Faust all the money that he had received of him, except such as had been expended in the business, together with interest, should Faust make oath or produce evidence that he himself had borrowed at interest the money which he had advanced. Faust having sworn that he had so borrowed a sum of 1550 florins, which he had paid over to Gutemberg, a notarial act, similar to what is called "judgment" in our courts of law, was signed against Gutemberg on the 6th November, 1455. This produced a dissolution of the partnership; for Gutemberg, not being able to pay the money, the whole of the printing establishment became the property of Faust.

It has not been clearly ascertained which was the book first printed by Gutemberg and Faust, nor, indeed, that any book was finished by them during their partnership. There is, however, good reason to believe that at the time of their separation considerable progress had been made in an edition of the Bible, which appears to have been finished in eight months, at the furthest, from the date of the notarial act which terminated the partnership; for in a copy of this Bible, bound in two volumes folio, now preserved in the Royal Library at Paris, there is, in the first volume, a memorandum, written by Henry Cremer, Vicar of St. Stephen's, Mentz, stating that it was illuminated and rubricated by him on St. Bartholomew's Day (August 24), 1456: and in the second volume there is another memorandum by the same person, stating that it was illuminated, bound, and finished by him on the Feast of the Assumption of the Virgin (August 15), 1456. To "illuminate" a book, in the language of that period, was to insert in their proper places large ornamental capital letters, and to decorate the margins with flowered borders and fanciful devices, usually in colours and gold; whilst to "rubricate" was to mark the smaller capitals, the beginnings of chapters, and particular paragraphs, with red ink. In many early printed books, a blank space used to be left for the large initial letters, which were afterwards drawn in colours by the illuminator. John Trithemius, Abbot of the Monastery of St. James, at Wurtzburg, who had his information from Peter Scheffer, says, in the account of the invention of printing, contained in his "Annales Hirsaugienses," that "great difficulties attended the first establishment of this art; for having begun to print a Bible, they found that they had expended upwards of 4000 florins before they had completed the third quaternion." The quaternion was what is now called a gathering of four sheets. The Bible illuminated by Henry Cremer was in all probability a copy of the edition mentioned by Trithemius.

Though no book has been discovered bearing the imprint of Gutemberg, there can be no doubt of his having established a printing office at Mentz, or in its vicinity, after the dissolution of his partnership with Faust. He does not appear to have printed many books; and of those that are supposed to have proceeded from his press, the "Catholicon" of Johannes de Balbis appears to be the best authenticated. On the 17th January, 1465, Adolphus, Archbishop of Mentz, appointed Gutemberg one of his courtiers, with the same allowance of clothing as the other nobles attending his court, and other privileges and exemptions. It is not known whether he continued to print after this time or no. He only enjoyed his appointment for about three years, for he appears to have died about the commencement of 1468. The precise day of his decease is not known, but from a deed relating to his printing materials, dated 24th February, 1468, he is mentioned as being then dead. He was born about the year 1400, and consequently would be in his sixty-eighth year at the time of his death.

In a work written by Hadrian Junius, a native of Holland, but not published till 1588, twelve years after his decease, a story is inserted ascribing the invention of printing to one Laurence Coster, of Harlem; and giving an account of his types and printing materials having been stolen on Christmas eve, 1442, by one of his servants named John—Faust, as is insinuated—who, flying to Mentz, there set up a press, not only robbing the said Laurence of his goods, but also depriving him of his deserved fame as the inventor of printing. Though many learned men have, since the publication of Junius's work, undertaken to support the claims put forth on behalf of Coster, yet each in succession has done little more than prove the insufficiency of his predecessors' theories, while he has at the same time been unwittingly accumulating evidence of the fallacy of his own; piling argument upon argument to prove that to be true, which, from an inspection of the work to which he refers, the "Speculum Salvationis," is immediately seen to be false; and finally producing a large work, the essence of which is, that the story of Coster's invention, and his being robbed, as told in the work of Junius, is inconsistent and incredible, but that the writer himself, out of the same materials, could contrive a story more feasible. While investigation has shown the groundlessness of Coster's pretensions, it has only confirmed the claims of Gutemberg.

WOOD-ENGRAVING IN CONNECTION WITH THE PRESS IN THE FIFTEENTH CENTURY.

Faust, having got quit of Gutemberg, continued the business of printing with the assistance of Scheffer, though the latter does not appear to have been admitted as a partner, having an interest in the stock and materials during the life-time of Faust. In an edition of "Cicero de Officiis," printed by them so late as 1465, the year before Faust's death, it is stated in the colophon, or imprint at the end of the book, that "John Faust, citizen of Mentz, executed the work, not with pen and ink, but by means of a certain beautiful art, by the hand of Peter, his servant." Whatever might have been intended by this imprint, it seems clear that Faust did not then consider Scheffer as his partner in the business, although his name had previously appeared in several works in conjunction with his own, and without any intimation that he was his servant.

The first printed book that appeared with a date was a Psalter, in large folio, printed in 1457, by Faust and Scheffer, in large type, so that it might be read at some distance by monks and priests when chaunting in the choir. If this work could be considered as the earliest specimen of typography, as it assuredly is the first with a certain date, it might indeed be almost said that the art had no infancy, but that it appeared at once in the fulness of vigour and beauty. All the known copies are on vellum; the body of the text is of a beautiful jet black, while the large initial letters are printed in red and blue. The largest of these is the letter B at the commencement of the first Psalm; and though it be the earliest specimen of a letter printed in two colours, by two separate impressions, it still continues to be the best, for though it has been several times imitated it has never been equalled. This letter, as well as each of the others which are printed in two colours, was probably engraved on two separate blocks of wood, from the designs, and under the superintendence of Scheffer, who, from his previous profession as a writer, would necessarily be acquainted with the art of drawing large initial letters for the ornamenting of manuscripts. A second edition of this Psalter appeared in 1459, and a third was printed in 1490 by Scheffer, who succeeded to the business on Faust's death. Scheffer himself died about the beginning of 1503, and was succeeded by his son John.

With the exception of large initial letters, and two shields of their arms, which appear printed in red at the end of some of their books, no specimens of wood-engraving are to be found in any of the books printed by Faust and Scheffer. The earliest typographic work containing wood-cuts, of figures, illustrative of the text, is a small folio volume of fables, in German verse, printed at Bamberg, by Albert Pfister, in 1461. Pfister also printed, in 1462, a History of Joseph, Daniel, Judith, and Esther, and, probably about the same period, an Allegorical work on Death, and an edition of the "Poor Preachers' Bible," all illustrated with wood-cuts. The following fac-simile of one of the cuts—Joseph making himself known to his Brethren—in the last-mentioned work, will afford some idea of the style and execution of the whole

COMMERCE AND MONEY.

Since our last publication, the money-market, in all its departments, has lost a portion of the buoyancy which the several weeks past and each fortnight's return on the 5th and 15th of the real description of public securities. In the share market the transactions are a matter comparatively unable, but many attribute this circumstance to the state of the time for transactions, and, as the public is prepared to take off only a limited quantity, three speculative operations of the day are followed by a fall in the value of some of the leading stocks and railroad associations which are in actual operation. In Birmingham Stock the decline has been rather serious, being not less than 2l per share since a week ago. The Great Northern and Great Grand Junction, the East North of England have likewise been subjected to rather serious depressions, but as the time account has been finally arranged, this fall can be attributed to the influence of money must again speedily restore activity in this most important department of the money-market — indeed, in those lines wherein the instruments as yet paid up, the premium price has been more nominal than real.

On the Foreign Stock Exchange, although business be less animated than it has latterly been, still the decline in prices has been unimportant, and the quotations on the whole are well which fact is calculated for speculative purchases. In Spanish bonds the variations have been considerable, and on the account just settled the Bonds must leap about one per cent. Other, however, confident, that at the next arrangement they will receive a level with those good to them. The foreign demand for Russian and Dutch bonds continues to be extensive, and the latter, in consequence, is quoted full one per cent. higher than a week ago. Portuguese are likewise in demand for foreign account, and so likewise are Brazilian, and this, added to the regular investment of money in them for British account, causes their prices to be well maintained. Mexican bonds do not improve in the estimation of capitalists, the same remark is also applicable to those of New Grenada, and the consequence of this part of both is the honesty of their rulers, is to place them nearer on a level with those of the repudiatory Provinces of the United States of North America. Chilian and Venezuela, on the contrary, are gradually improving in the good opinions of the monied interest.

On the English Stock Exchange a rumour has gained much credit, which has had rather an unfavourable influence on the account of our Sections, debt. It is said that the renewal of the Charter of the Bank of England is to grant to that establishment a monopoly of the issue of notes within the boundary of their rulers, is to place them nearer on a level with those of the repudiatory Provinces of the United States of North America. Chilian and Venezuela, on the contrary, are gradually improving in the good opinions of the monied interest.

REMARKABLE MEN.

How often we find a historical pen,
Recording the names of "remarkable men,"
Great men, from the earliest times have been found,
Whose names with their glory have lit the world 'round;
Ev'ry age, more or less, has been honour'd by those,
Whose Deeds, like the sun in the heaven arose,
But those of the present remarkable day,
Are grea er than any preceding quite,
In ceremony, no positive can we be due
To "remarkable men" like E. MOSES and SON.
Behold their display in the circles of fame
Behold what surprising improvements they're made!
See! See what a variety vests, 7s. each, at
And look at the millions that daily are clad!
Reflect on their mighty achievements—and then,
You'll view them as one of the "Wonders of Men."
These costumes combine ev'ry pleasing design,
And none can show contrast so remarkably fine
Not only at home do we hear of their worth,
But as far as the Emperor of China's earth,
Since dress was begun, there never was one,
To equal the bargains of MOSES and SON.

SPRING.—The prevalency of cutaneous visitations at this period of the year inculcates the necessity of preserving the Skin in a pure and healthy state, that its functions may be duly performed. The high and universal celebrity which ROWLAND'S KALYDOR continues to maintain as an active yet mild and soothing extirpator of all impurities of the skin, is during the period of Spring most pleasingly evinced. This preparation, eminently BALSAMIC, RESTORATIVE, and INVIGORATING, is equally celebrated for safety in application, as for unfailing efficacy in removing eruptions and discolourations; and in promoting a healthy freshness and transparency to the skin and complexion. An universally great demand exciting the cupidity of unprincipled Shopkeepers, was given the title of "GENUINE" KALYDOR to compounds of the most deleterious character, containing mineral astringents utterly ruinous to the complexion, and, by their repellant action endangering health. It is therefore important on purchasers to see that the words "ROWLAND'S KALYDOR," are on the wrapper All others are FRAUDULENT COUNTERFEITS!

HISTORY OF WOOD-ENGRAVING.

Until the discovery of those works printed by Pfister at Bamberg in 1461 and 1462, it was generally supposed that the art of printing was confined exclusively to Mentz till that city was taken by the troops of the Archbishop Adolphus of Nassau, in October, 1462, when several of Faust and Scheffer's workmen, availing themselves of the opportunity of quitting their service, carried a knowledge of the art to other places. Faust and Scheffer, probably on account of this desertion of their workmen, appear to have discontinued their business for about two years; and when they resumed it, in 1465, two Germans, Conrad Sweynheim and Arnold Pannartz, who had most likely been in their service, had already established a press at the Monastery of Subbiaco, near Rome. The following is the order in which the art of printing became established at other places, with the names of the printers, and the titles of the first books which they printed.

There seems reason to believe that the progress of typography was viewed with jealousy by the old block-printers and wood-engravers, and that they were not at first willing to co-operate with the professors of the new art. At Augsburg, in 1471, where the business of wood-engraving and card-making appears to have been established for some time, the wood-engravers opposed Gunther Zainer's admission to the freedom of the city, which was necessary before he could begin business; and endeavoured to prohibit him from printing wood-engravings in his books. Through the interest, however, of Melchior Stamhaus, Abbot of St. Ulric's, the magistrates decided that Zainer, and John Schussler, another printer, whom the wood-engravers had also objected to, should be allowed to follow the business of printing without molestation, but that they should not print large initial letters from wood-blocks, nor insert wood-cuts in their books, as this would be an infringement of the privileges of the wood-engravers. Subsequently Zainer came to an agreement with the wood-engravers, who assented to his printing as many initial letters and wood-cuts as he pleased, provided that they had the engraving of them. From the first establishment of typography till 1467, no wood-cuts, of a pictorial character, are to be found in any books except those printed at Bamberg, by Albert Pfister, who appears to have had a press there for only a few years, and to have had no successor till 1481.

Next to the books printed by Pfister, the earliest book illustrated with wood-cuts is the "Meditationes Joannis de Torre-cremata," printed at Rome by Ulric Hahn, in 1467. In 1472, appeared the first edition of "Valturius," illustrated with numerous wood-cuts, printed at Verona, by "John of Verona, the son of Nicholas the Surgeon." Among the many curious cuts in this book are the figures of a bomb-shell, a hand-gun, and a boat with paddle-wheels, in the manner of a steam-boat—all of which have been supposed to have been invented long afterwards: but many things supposed to be new appear to be old when looking over old books, illustrated with drawings or wood-engravings. From this time, till the year 1500, the practice of illustrating books with wood-cuts gradually increased; and ornamental initial letters were more generally introduced. In an edition of the "Fasciculus Temporum," printed at Utrecht, by John Veldener, in 1480, an ornamental border, of foliage and flowers, engraved on wood, and surrounding the whole page, may be observed; and in an edition of the "Horæ in laudem Beatissimæ Virginis Mariæ," printed at Paris, by Anthony Verard, 1488, every page is surrounded by an ornamental border, in imitation of the beautiful illuminated borders to be found in manuscript works of devotion of the same period. The practice of thus illustrating printed editions of the "Horæ," with ornamental borders, soon became prevalent in other countries, though the Parisian printers appear always to have been superior to all others in their tasteful "pattern" books of this kind. Of the "Horæ" printed at Paris between 1500 and 1550, the editions published by Simon Vostre and Thielman Kerver are the most deservedly celebrated for their wood-engravings. In 1482 the first maps engraved on wood appeared in a folio edition of Ptolemy, printed at Ulm, by Leonard Holl; and at the top of one of them is the name of the engraver, John Schnitzer, of Armsheim. From the difficulty of cutting small letters in wood, the method of entirely cutting out a piece of the block and inserting the names of places in type was subsequently invented. The earliest specimens of this method are to be seen in the maps to an edition of "Solinus," printed at Venice, by Jacobus Pentius, in 1511. The earliest English book containing wood-cuts is the second edition of Caxton's "Game of Chess," without date, but supposed to have been printed in 1476.

All the wood-cuts which appear in books printed before 1486, consist of little more than outline, with the shadows and folds of the draperies indicated by a series of short parallel lines, but without the introduction of any lines crossing each other, forming what is technically called "cross-hatching," and they are generally inferior, both in design and execution, to the cuts of the old block-books, such as the "Revelations and History of St. John," the "History of the Virgin," and the "Poor Preachers' Bible." The earliest specimen of cross-hatching occurs in the frontispiece to "Breydenbach's Travels," printed at Mentz, by Erhard Reawich, in 1486. This beautiful cut, looking both at the design and the means employed to express it, is the most excellent and effective of the productions of the art of wood-engraving which had previously appeared. Several other cuts in the same volume, though less elaborately executed, also display in the drawing and composition the skill of a practised artist.

In 1493 appeared at Nuremberg the first edition of the work generally called the Nuremberg Chronicle, containing about 2000 illustrations, many of which are repetitions of the same subject printed from the same block. Though it is stated at the end of the work that the cuts were executed under the superintendence of two men of science, and of skill in the art of painting William Pleydenwurff, and Michael Wolgemuth, who was the master of Albert Durer—they do no credit to either their knowledge or their taste. They have very much the appearance of "manufactured" cuts which had been furnished by contract at so much per hundred, as if quantity and not quality had been the chief object of the publisher. It may be truly said of most of them that they illustrate nothing but the want of taste in all the parties who were engaged in their production. Such rubbish was never before, nor since, presented to the world in any one work.

From this period cross-hatchings, as a means of representing shade and of indicating local colour, may generally be observed in old German wood-engravings; in Italy, however, the old manner of engraving, without cross-hatchings, and chiefly in outline, continued to prevail for upwards of thirty years later. The best specimens of Italian wood-engraving are to be found in a work entitled "Hypnerotomachia Poliphili," printed at Venice by Aldus in 1499. Many of the cuts in this volume have a classical character, proving that the artist had paid considerable attention to the antique, and was not merely a transmitter of Gothic conventionalities. The designs have been ascribed both to Andrea Mantegna and to Raffaele, though upon no other ground than conjecture: Raffaele indeed was only 16 when the work was printed.

For many years after the establishment of typography, the practice of block-printing was still continued by the old wood-engravers; and specimens of single sheets, such as sheet almanacks, or wall-calendars as they were called by the Germans, executed in this manner, between 1480 and 1500, and even later, are preserved in several libraries on the continent. In the first edition of the "Speculum Salvationis," a work which some learned men, have supposed to have been printed by Laurence Coster, about 1440, the cuts at the top of the page, in light sepia-coloured ink, have been printed by means of friction with a kind of burnisher, while the text below has been printed from metal types, by means of a press, in black full-bodied ink. In a later edition of this work, with the same cuts, some pages of the text are printed from engraved wood-blocks, while the others are printed from type. The only key to this mystery seems to be, that the cuts had been the property of a block-printer, who having had the text of the first edition set up and printed from types, tried to cut the text for the second entirely on wood, but got tired before he had finished his task, and so was obliged to apply again to a letter-press printer to enable him to complete the work. This edition of the "Speculum Salvationis" has generally been referred to by Coster's advocates as containing a proof of his having invented the art of printing with moveable types. The assumption is that he first began to print the text from engraved wood-blocks, and that he afterwards invented the art of printing from metal types, with which he completed the remainder. Both the assumption and the conclusion are specious; but both, notwithstanding, are wrong. The theory is directly in opposition to the fact as displayed by the books themselves. If any argument can "make that fiction which was once a fact," there is a chance for Laurence Coster: but his advocates have still "their work to do." There are no means of ascertaining when the first edition of the Speculum appeared, though it is not likely that it was printed earlier than 1472. In 1483, John Veldener printed at Culemburg, a quarto edition of the Speculum, with the same cuts that had appeared in the earlier folio editions, but the blocks had been sawn in two in order that they might suit the smaller page.

WOOD-ENGRAVING IN THE SIXTEENTH CENTURY.

Though the earliest of the wood-cuts designed by Albert Durer appeared towards the close of the fifteenth century, yet as by far the greater number appeared in the sixteenth, it appears preferable to commence this section with some account of his works, in order to mark more emphatically an important epoch in the history of wood-engraving, for no artist of his time contributed more to its advancement. He was born at Nuremberg, on the 12th May, 1471, and continued with his father, who was a goldsmith, and, consequently, a kind of engraver, till his sixteenth year; when, having conceived a great desire to become a painter, he was placed as a pupil with Michael Wolgemuth, for three years, to learn the art of painting. On the expiration of this term, he left his master, and proceeded, in 1490, to travel, for further instruction and experience, according to the custom of both German artists and artisans of that period. In the course of his travels, which probably did not extend beyond Germany, he visited Colmar, where he was kindly entertained by the brothers of Martin Schongauer, a painter of great eminence, and the best copper-plate engraver in Germany of his time. He did not, however, see the great artist himself, though some writers have supposed that he was Durer's master in the art of engraving. Durer returned to Nuremberg in 1492, where he shortly afterwards married Agnes Frey, a woman of considerable personal charms, but of bad temper. It has been said that she was the plague of his life, and that she hastened his death by her urging him to unremitting exertions, for the sake of getting money. In looking over Durer's numerous works, it is painful to think that some, which seem to have been engraved con amore, may have been in reality "worked on" by the artist, when incited, but not inspired, by his shrewish wife. The earliest date to be found on any of Durer's copper-plates is 1494. Whether he received any instruction in the art of engraving, beyond what he might acquire, when working with his father, as a goldsmith, is unknown.

It is deserving of remark that one of the earliest subjects which occupied Durer's pencil as a designer on wood, was the Apocalypse—a subject which had been a favourite with the old wood-engravers, and whose illustrations of it, and of an apocryphal history of St. John, constitute one of the oldest of the block books. It appears also to have been printed and published by Durer, on his own account, as the block-books were by the old wood-engravers. It consists of sixteen cuts, of folio size, with the simple title, in German, "The Revelation of St. John," and the imprint, at the end, "Printed at Nuremberg, by Albert Durer, painter, 1498." Another work of Durer's, consisting of illustrations of the History of the Virgin, which had also formed the subject of one of the old pictorial block-books, appeared in 1513; and a series of eleven large cuts, illustrative of Christ's Passion, was published by him about the same time.

The wood-engravings which constitute those three works are decidedly superior to any that preceded them. The drawing is free and vigorous, and the composition, or arrangement of the several objects, displays great skill in this department of pictorial art. The expression, action, and costume of the several figures, though displaying many of the peculiarities of the German school, as well as of Durer's individual ideal, evince yet more strongly the active imagination and the practised hand of a truly great artist. His eye for nature is evident in them all; and he seldom neglects an opportunity of introducing some object or incident which reminds the spectator of real life, although possibly it may not harmonise with his ideal of the subject. Though his men and women appear much more like Germans of the fifteenth, than Jews and Gentiles of the first century, yet they all suggest the idea of real persons doing what is appropriate to the character and situation assigned to them by the imagination of the artist. There may be, indeed, anachronisms discoverable in the costume, and the treatment of the subject may seem not sufficiently elevated, yet a spirit which speaks to the mind pervades the whole. The landscapes are skilfully introduced; and in them, for the first time in any wood engravings, trees are naturally represented, by their appropriate characteristics of different kinds of stems, branches, and foliage. In many old wood-engravings a tree is indicated by a scrubby looking symbol, which bears about as much resemblance to the thing represented, as a bad drawing of an old birch broom bears to a living oak.

In Durer's works, whether paintings, copper-plates, or wood-engravings, and also in the works of several other German artists of his time, a striking peculiarity may be observed in the drapery of the female figures. This peculiarity consists in the sharpness and stiffness of the folds, which suggest the idea of the drapery having been starched and cast on the figure when wet, and of there being allowed to dry there without being moved. This appearance indeed was probably occasioned from the custom which the German artists of that period had of casting their draperies on little lay figures, in a thin kind of paper, which they allowed to dry before making their drawing.

Another great work of Durer's, but not one of his best, is a large triumphal arch designed by him for the Emperor Maximilian. It consists of ninety-two pieces, separately engraved on wood, and forming when united one vast subject, which is about ten feet high by nine and a half wide. Durer also designed for the Emperor a triumphal car, which was engraved on wood by Jerome Resch, one of the most celebrated wood-engravers of his time. This subject consists of eight pieces, which, when joined together, are upwards of 7 feet long by about 18 inches high. The Emperor Maximilian was a great patron of the art of wood-engraving. Besides the two subjects above mentioned drawn by Durer, the following were also drawn and engraved on wood by the Emperor's order for the purpose of commemorating the principal events of his life and perpetuating his fame. 1. The cuts to a volume entitled the "Adventures of Sir Theurdank," an allegorical poem, said to have been the joint composition of the Emperor and his secretary, Melchior Pfintzing, and narrating several of the personal adventures of the Emperor himself under the character of Sir Theurdank, the pink of courtesy and knighthood. This work, which was first printed at Nuremberg in 1517, contains a hundred and eighteen cuts, probably all designed by Hans Schauffelein, whose monogram and mark occur on about half a dozen of them: his mark is a little shovel, a rebus of his name Schauffelein, which in German signifies a little shovel or baker's peel. 2. The cuts to a work entitled the "Wise King," a work relating to the history of the Emperor's father, and his own education. This work was not completed at the time of the Emperor's death, though all the cuts appear to have been finished and impressions of them taken. The original blocks having been discovered in the Jesuits' College at Gratz in Stiria, the text and cuts were printed together for the first time, at Vienna, in 1775. There are two hundred and thirty six old cuts in the work, and of this number ninety-two contain the mark of Hans Burgmair. 3. A series of large cuts usually known by the title of the Triumphs of Maximilian, but sometimes confounded with the Triumphal Car designed by Durer. Most of the designs for the Triumphs were made by Hans Burgmair, but the whole of the cuts do appear to have been finished at the time of Maximilian's death, which happened on the 12th January 1519. Forty of the original blocks of this series having been discovered at Ambras in the Tyrol, and ninety-five more at the Jesuits' College at Gratz, the whole were brought to Vienna and deposited in the Imperial Library; and in 1796 an edition of them was printed at Vienna, by permission of the Austrian Government. The blocks are all of pear-tree, and at the back of several of them the names or marks of the engravers are written. Of the hundred and thirty-five cuts of the Triumphs published there are sixteen which probably do not belong to the series, as the subjects are not to be found in the original drawings of Hans Burgmair, now preserved in the Imperial Library at Vienna, and as the style in which they are designed is so different from that of the others. The Triumphs are the best, both in design and engraving, of all the wood-cuts executed for the Emperor, not excepting those designed by Albert Durer. Besides the several series above enumerated, there are many other wood-cuts relating to the Emperor and his family, which appear to have been drawn and engraved by his order. The following cut is a fac-simile of one of the figures in the Triumphs.

The whole number of wood-cuts which contain Albert Durer's mark, and which were unquestionably designed by him, is about two hundred; the earliest are those of the Apocalypse, printed in 1498, and the two latest are his own portrait and the siege of a fortified town, both dated 1527, the year before his death. Whether Durer, and other celebrated painters of his time, such as Hans Burgmair and Lucas Cranach, who were accustomed to make drawings on wood, were also wood-engravers, has frequently been debated, but never positively determined, and probably never will be. It has been indeed positively asserted that they were, but no satisfactory proof of the fact has been produced. Assuming as an indisputable fact that they did not engrave all the cuts which bear their mark, and admitting that they did engrave some of them, the question then is, which really are the cuts engraved by themselves? But as this question cannot be decided, the result of the supposition that they did engrave on wood themselves, is that, as wood-engravers, they were not superior to many of the mere workmen of the period whose names have died with them. It may be said, indeed, that those cuts ought to be ascribed to them which display the greatest excellence in the execution; but this is merely cutting the knot, not untying it, for how can it be known that the best cuts are of their own engraving, and how is their excellence to be estimated?

Of the large wood-cuts with Durer's mark, there is one in particular which has frequently been referred to as a master-piece of wood engraving, and which, from its superiority in point of workmanship, has been supposed to have been executed in part, if not entirely, by Durer himself. It is thus described in the catalogue of the late Wm. Young Ottley's engravings:—"God the Father, seated in Heaven, supporting the dead body of Christ, a master-piece of wood-engraving, most probably in part executed by Albert's own hand." Although it is undeniable that there is more work in this cut than in most of the others drawn by Durer, and that the lines, both single and crossing, are more clearly and delicately engraved, yet it by no means necessarily follows that when viewed as a whole, and as a production of imitative art, it should be a master-piece of wood-engraving. The excellence of any wood-engraving, when regarded as a production of art, and not as a mere mechanical piece of workmanship, does not consist in delicately engraved single lines and elaborate cross-hatchings alone, but in the proper adaptation and sufficient execution of lines, of whatever kind, as the means of appropriately suggesting the artist's idea of his subject to the mind of the spectator. In this latter respect the so-called "master-piece" of Durer's wood-engravings is deficient; too much mere mechanical labour has been bestowed on it; the means are too obtrusive, for the eye is more forcibly arrested by the evidence of the workman's labour than the mind is affected by the artist's design. This cut—which has been so highly praised by some who appear to have mistaken elaborate execution for artistic excellence in wood-engraving—may, however, form a useful study to engravers and designers on wood, not indeed as an example to be imitated, but as affording so striking an instance of misapplied labour in the quantity of its cross-hatchings, which suggest no idea of either colour or texture to the imagination, and are expressive of nothing but the workman's pains.

Though no one of the cuts with Durer's mark is so decidedly superior in execution to many others of the same period as to warrant the assumption of its having been engraved by himself, and, consequently, of his being one of the best wood-engravers of his time, yet as he was a man of great and various talents, and singularly expert in the employment of the instruments of art, it is yet possible that he might occasionally have taken up the graver, and engraved some portions of the cuts designed by himself. He was one of the best painters of his time in Germany, and his talent in this branch of art was very highly estimated by many contemporary Italian painters, among whom was Giovanni Bellini, the master of Titian; though there were others—as he himself writes, in a letter from Venice, in 1506—who said, that though he could engrave well, yet his paintings were not according to ancient art, and that he knew not how to manage his colours. He was one of the best copperplate engravers of his time, and he appears to have been the first person who applied the process of etching—that is, of "biting-in" the lines by means of a corrosive liquid for the purpose of obtaining impressions on paper from a plate of metal. Two of Durer's earliest etchings are dated 1511, and it has been conjectured that they were executed on iron plates. There appears reason to believe that the process of etching was employed both by German and Italian armourers in "biting-in" the ornamental figures on plate-armour, before it was applied by Durer to the purposes of engraving, in the more limited sense of the word.

Durer was also an excellent sculptor, or rather carver, as his productions in this department of art, both from their size and material, are rather carvings than sculptures. There is an admirable specimen of his talent in this branch of art preserved in the British Museum. The subject is the "Birth of St. John the Baptist," and it is executed in bone-stone; and, though the dimensions are only seven and three-quarter inches high by five and a half wide, the different figures are executed in bold relief, and their various characters and expressions are most distinctly portrayed. This gem of art, though but a carving in bone-stone, formerly belonged to the late R. Payne Knight, who purchased it at Brussels, for five hundred guineas. Durer not only excelled in the practice of art, but also wrote on the theory. His work on "The Proportions of the Human Body," first printed at Nuremberg, in 1527, was translated both into Latin and

French, and was several times reprinted. He also wrote two other works—"An Essay on the Fortification of Towns and Villages," and "Instructions for Measuring with the Rule and Compass." He died at Nuremberg, on the 6th April, 1528, in the fifty-seventh year of his age. He was a great artist and a good man.

Of the other artists, of the time of Albert Durer, who made drawings on wood, the following may be enumerated as the best in this respect:—Lucas Cranach, born at Cranach, in the territory of Bamberg, chiefly patronised by the princes of the Electoral House of Saxony, and who generally inserted a shield of their arms in his cuts, perhaps to signify either that he enjoyed their patronage, or that the cuts were executed at their instance. Hans Burgmair, born at Augsburg. Hans Schauffelin, born at Nuremberg. Hans Baldung Grün, a pupil of Durer. Lucas Van Leyden: there are but few wood-engravings of this artist's designing. Urse Graff, of Basle, who, in a cut, with the date 1523, calls himself a goldsmith and die-sinker: several of the ornamented title-borders in books printed by Frobenius contain the mark of Urse Graff. From the time that Albert Durer first began to draw on wood until his decease, more wood-cuts appear to have been engraved in Germany than in any equal period of time, either before or since; and the best have, in respect to design, been rarely surpassed, or even equalled, in any country, or at any time. More than one artist of great reputation in modern times has, in his historic compositions, freely availed himself of the assistance to be derived from old German wood-engravings of the time of Albert Durer.

In the first thirty years of the sixteenth century, wood-engraving does not appear to have met with much encouragement in Italy; and the comparatively few wood-cuts which are to be found in books printed in Italy at that period are generally feebly designed and slightly executed, forming a striking contrast when compared with the more boldly drawn and more elaborately executed German wood-engravings of the same period. It has frequently been asserted by many writers on art, that the method of engraving in chiaro-scuro on wood was first introduced by Ugo da Carpi, an Italian artist, who executed several subjects in this manner, chiefly after designs by Raffaele, about 1518. There is, however, good reason to believe that this method had been previously employed by German artists; for there is a chiaro-scuro wood engraving with the mark of Lucas Cranach, dated 1509. Three others are also known—two by Hans Baldung Grun, and one by Hans Burgmair—which are respectively dated 1509, 1510, and 1512. The manner of producing an imitation of a chiaro-scuro drawing, by means of wood-engraving, consists in engraving the subject on two or more blocks, and in printing from them, by successive impressions, the various gradations of light and shade, in the same colour, but in different degrees of strength. Some of Ugo da Carpi's chiaro-scuros are printed in a kind of mulberry colour, while others are of a sage-green. The colour usually employed by subsequent wood-engravers is a kind of sepia. In the titles of several German books, printed between 1513 and 1570, a tint of sepia has been printed over the ornamental wood-cut border. Chiaro-scuro engraving appears to have been much more highly appreciated, and more successfully cultivated in Italy than in Germany; for the Italian chiaro-scuros are not only much more numerous than the German, but are infinitely superior to them both in design and effect. The best Italian chiaro-scuros are chiefly from designs by Raffaele and Parmeciano.

From the origin of printing till about the time of Albert Durer's decease, most of the books which appeared were folios and quartos, chiefly for the use of the learned and studious; and even those of a lighter character which were printed for the solace and amusement of knights and squires, and lords and ladies—for at that period there was no reading public—appeared in the same solid form. Reading, even for amusement, was then indeed a task for many a gallant knight and noble dame; for however interested they might be in the story, they yet found great difficulty in spelling out the words in which it was told; a difficulty which originated in the want of a good spelling-book, and from their not having been thoroughly initiated in the mysteries of a, b, ab, and which was increased by the contracted words which are so frequent in early printed books. In several historical works—whose reputation is much greater than their merit—we are told of sundry kings and queens, and other great personages of former times, who were so devoted to literature, that they always had some useful or interesting book read to them when they were at meals. In such instances, however, of a love of literature, it is generally to be suspected that the party so extolled was really indifferent to reading, and could best endure to hear a good book read at a time when other pleasing occupations of the senses did not permit the subject to become fatiguing; the substantial viands being too engrossing to allow of any great appetite for the spare "feast of reason." When a taste for reading became more generally diffused, books of a smaller form, and on a greater variety of subjects, were more generally published; and, as a natural consequence, the cuts with which they were illustrated were of a smaller size and more delicate execution than those which had previously appeared in the older folios and quartos. From about 1530, a decided improvement in point of execution may be generally observed in the wood-cuts contained in books printed in Italy, and more especially in those printed at Venice. At that period there were more printers in Venice than in any other city of Europe, and they appear to have been among the first who printed books of comparatively small form for general circulation. Many books, which the jealousy of governments, or the hostility of particular classes, did not allow of being printed in other countries, readily found publishers in republican Venice. Basle and Lyons were also celebrated about this time as marts for books, and the printers of the latter city appear to have been the rivals of those of Venice in the publication of small and neatly printed books.

Hans Holbein—who, in addition to his fame as a painter, is entitled to the credit of having been one of the best designers on wood of his time—was the son of a painter, of the same name, and appears to have been born at Augsburg, about 1498. About the beginning of the sixteenth century his father removed to Basle, and there his son was brought up by him to his own profession. Young Hans gave tokens of his great future excellence as a painter at an early age; and Hegner, his biographer, mentions a portrait in oil, of considerable merit, which he painted when he was only fifteen. Like many other eminent German painters of his time he made designs for wood-engravers and goldsmiths, and he occasionally travelled, in Switzerland and Suabia, in search of employment as an artist. Though the works which he executed while he resided at Basle bear testimony both of his industry and talents, it would appear that he was either very poorly remunerated or that he was improvident, for he is generally represented as having been in poor circumstances. As his contemporaries give him the character of a "jolly fellow," who loved his glass and was rather partial to low company, it is likely that he was both unthrifty and badly paid—two grand obstacles to an artist's attaining to "easy circumstances," however great his talents. He was intimate with Erasmus, who then resided at Basle, and painted two or three portraits of him. The following is a copy of a wood-engraving of one of those portraits which appeared in an edition of Sebastian Munster's "Cosmography," printed at Basle in 1550.

ERASMUS AFTER HOLBEIN.

In 1525 Holbein appears to have entertained the design of visiting England, probably influenced by the praise bestowed on one of his portraits of Erasmus, which appears to have been sent by the latter to Sir Thomas More. Sir Thomas, in a letter to Erasmus, dated 18th of December, 1525, alludes to Holbein's wish to visit England, and says that though he may not find it so fruitful as he may expect, yet that he, Sir Thomas, will do what he can that he may not find it entirely barren.

Holbein set out for England about the beginning of September, 1526: and, as he intended to pass through Antwerp on his way, Erasmus gave him a letter of introduction to his friend Peter Ægidius, a person of considerable influence in that city. This letter is written in the style of a cool and cautious patron, who does not wish to be debited with any favours that might be shown to the party introduced. Holbein is indeed praised as an excellent artist, who is proceeding to England to gain a few "angels;" but it is also indirectly intimated that he is a person of little consequence; that should he wish to see Quintin Matsys, Ægidius can send his servant with him to show him the house, should he not have leisure to go with him himself.

Holbein, on his arrival in England, appears to have been well received by Sir Thomas More, and it is generally supposed that he continued to reside in his house till 1528, when he was appointed painter to Henry VIII. From entries in the household accounts of Henry, it would appear that Holbein's salary, or fee, as court-painter, was thirty pounds per annum, which would be equal to a hundred and fifty pounds in the present day. It is probable that he was paid a certain sum in addition for each picture that he painted for the king, and was also permitted to paint for other persons on his own account, when not fully employed on the commissions of his royal master. Though he visited Basle, where he had left his wife and two children, on three occasions namely, in 1529, 1533, and 1538—yet, for the rest of his life, England was the place of his settled abode. It has been supposed that towards the end of his life he was comparatively neglected. He died of the plague in 1554, in the second year of the reign of Queen Mary, whose portrait he had painted the year before. On Holbein's merits as a painter it is unnecessary here to enlarge. His style was truly original; he imitated no master and he was the representative of no school. His portraits, beyond those of any other artist of his time, are distinguished by life-like character and natural expression two qualities, which, in an individual likeness, are of much more positive value than a "graceful turn of the head," and an "elevating touch of the ideal." Holbein appears to have painted men and women as they were, not as he might fancy that they ought to be; and hence nothing that suggests the idea of an affected or theatrical character is to be perceived in his portraits. In his day there were no female opera-dancers from whose fascinating, though falsetto, expression he might snatch a grace, to be transferred to the heads of the female nobility.

Though Holbein made many excellent designs on wood, yet his fame in this respect chiefly rests on the cuts contained in a small book usually called the "Dance of Death," the first edition of which, containing forty-one cuts, appeared at Lyons in 1538. It was many times reprinted there, and in all the editions subsequent to the third, which appeared in 1545, additional cuts are introduced. The eighth edition, published in 1562, contains fifty-eight cuts, being seventeen more than were in the first; but of those additional cuts seven at least have no relation to the original subject, although it is likely that they were all drawn by Holbein. A piracy of the work, with fac-similes of the cuts, was published at Venice in 1545; and another piracy was published at Cologne in 1555, and several times reprinted. The cuts in the Venice and Cologne editions are greatly inferior to the originals. Several editions were subsequently published at different places, with the subjects engraved on copper; and about 1548 thirty of the subjects were etched by Hollar, who appears to have copied the inferior cuts of the Cologne edition, and not to have improved on his models. The cuts of the "Dance of Death" were also copied on wood, with occasional alterations and modifications, by John Bewick, for a little work published under the title of "Emblems of Mortality," in 1788; and fac-similes are also given in Mr. Douce's "Dance of Death," published in 1833. In this work Mr. Douce has laboured in vain to prove that Holbein was not the designer of the original cuts of the "Dance of Death." His trifling arguments have neither weakened Holbein's title nor added to his own fame. The testimony of contemporary writers that Holbein was the designer of the cuts of the Lyons "Dance of Death," is direct and positive, and is confirmed by the internal evidence of the cuts themselves, when compared with other undisputed works of Holbein, and yet his well-founded title is to be set aside on mere speculation, supported, indeed, by an apocryphal letter, supposed to have been written in the reign of William III. by one T. Nieuhoff Picard—a name which, from the letter itself, may be justly suspected of being an alias for the Man in the Moon.

The idea of Holbein's "Dance of Death" was probably suggested by a series of illustrations of the same subject painted on the wall of a court-house attached to the Dominican convent at Basle. Such subjects, representing Death in the act of seizing men and women of all ranks and ages, were in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries to be found painted, as a "memento mori," on the walls churches in several places in Europe. There was a "Dance of Death" painted in the cloisters of Old St. Paul's, London, which was said to have been executed in the reign of Henry VI., at the cost of Jenkin Carpenter, one of the executors of Richard Whittington, so celebrated in nursery literature, in connection with his cat. There was also a "Dance of Death" at Lubeck, Minden, Leipsic, Dijon, Paris, and several other places. It would appear that what is now generally called the "Dance of Death" was frequently called the "Dance Macabre," in France, towards the latter end of the fifteenth century, from the supposed name of the author, Macaber, who wrote the verses explaining the several subjects. The first edition of the "Dance Macabre," with wood-cuts and explanatory verses, was printed at Paris by Guy Marchant in 1485; and an edition was also printed at Lyons in 1499, nearly forty years before the publication, at the same place, of Holbein's "Dance of Death."

Though many of the subjects in the old "Dance Macabre" and in Holbein's "Dance of Death" are nearly alike, and represent the same characters, yet the manner in which they are treated is very different; while the former display much both of the rudeness and the feebleness of early art, the latter display in every figure the vigorous conception and practised hand of a master. All Holbein's characters are admirably represented, whether old or young, lay or clerical, knight or ploughman, patron or client, merchant or pedlar; in every subject the story is plainly, simply, and yet most significantly told. Even the skeleton Death seems to be alive; now arresting a Pope in his pride of place, now spearing a stout warrior with his own lance; and anon, as a dame d'honneur, conducting an empress to the grave, or, as a kidnapper, dragging away a peasant's child; and most clearly indicating by his action and expression that he dispatches his business, with people of all ranks and ages, with great ease and pleasure to himself. Although those cuts are "glossed" or expounded with texts of Scripture and serious moral reflections, yet the spirit which pervades them is essentially comic—the droll fellow who creates the amusement, by balking the hopes of mortals, being Death. It is indeed questionable if any man in viewing those imaginary freaks of Death's emblem ever thought seriously of his own end—of the hour when he himself should fall before the great King of Terrors,

> The scytheman of the earth,
> Whose harvest rounds the year; who ne'er had dearth
> Since first the world was peopled.

The cuts of Holbein's "Dance of Death" are executed in a manner worthy of the designs. They are truly master-pieces of wood-engraving; and though they have been frequently copied, all the so-called fac-similes that have hitherto appeared, are far inferior to the originals. A few years ago one of the best wood-engravers of this, or indeed any other country, being asked his opinion of those cuts, and if he thought that he could re-engrave them in a manner equally excellent, replied, "They are the best wood-engravings that I have ever seen; and I certainly do not think that if I were to re-engrave them, my copies would be equal to the originals. Such things as they are, engraved in the best manner, from original designs, which have all the spirit of the master to guide the engraver, can never be equalled by any copies." There is no needless display of mere mechanical skill in those cuts; they are executed in a manner at once simple and efficient; and they are not so remarkable for the mere delicacy of the lines, as for lines properly applied to convey a meaning. It has not been ascertained who was the engraver, though one Hans Lutzelburger, who was probably a native of Basle, appears to have the best pretensions to the honour. He was unquestionably the engraver of an alphabet of initial letters designed by Holbein, containing subjects nearly the same as several of those in the "Dance of Death" published at Lyons, in 1538, and executed in a similar style; and one of the cuts in the latter work contains as a mark the letters H. L., which, whether intended or not, are certainly the initial letters of the name Hans Lutzelburger. Letters of the alphabet above referred to are to be met with in books printed both at Basle and Strasburg, about 1530.

[Owing to the illness of the engraver to whom the illustration of this article has been intrusted, we are unable to present to our readers in this Supplement some highly-finished specimens of the more advanced state of Wood-Engraving; but they will appear in future numbers of our journal, until the Treatise is completed.]

PAUL AND VIRGINIA.

PAUL AND VIRGINIA.

This is a companion illustration to the exquisite scene engraved in No. 89 of our journal; and, like its avant courier, is copied from a splendid print engraved by Eugene Jazet, from a painting by Schopin.

PAUL TO VIRGINIA.

Though in a wood
And solitude,
Bewilder'd from our home—
I feel with thee
Sweet Virginie!
'Tis happy thus to roam!
For in this loneliness,
Amid our deep distress,
The music of the birds
Cannot compare
With what I dare
To call the melody of thy dear words!
We've left all desolate—but hark!
I hear Fidele's trusty bark—
And see he comes—
Domingo too—
We near our homes
When they're in view!
Then let me gently guide you there—
Sweet girl! awake from thy despair—
And be this stolen kiss the charm
To shield thee hence from every harm!

COURSING.—GREYHOUNDS.

COURSING.—GREYHOUNDS.

We present our readers with a portrait of one of "the most distinguished" greyhounds of the past season, "Smuggler," the property of Mr. Salter, of Pimlico, some of whose breed have lately been sent to his Royal Highness Prince Albert. "Smuggler" is a dog of noble breed—a descendant from the celebrated "Snowball." He has extraordinary speed and courage, with unflinching bottom, and is supposed to be one of the best bred dogs of the present day; he is now three years old. We have not space for his pedigree, which is considered in the sporting world to be the best extant.

CAST-IRON LIGHTHOUSE FOR THE WEST INDIES.

In passing over Waterloo-bridge a few days since, we were struck with the appearance of a large tower, forming a conspicuous object on the Surrey side of the river. Upon inquiry, we found the new fabric which had sprung up so rapidly in the Cornwall-road, to be a lighthouse in course of erection on the extensive premises of Messrs. Cottam and Hallen, the engineers and iron-founders.

The tower is constructed of cast-iron concentric plates, and it is intended, when permanently fixed, for a lighthouse on the sea shore of the island of Bermuda, in the West Indies.

The extreme height of the whole, from the base to the ball on the top of the lantern will be, when completed, as seen in the engraving, about 130 feet. The outside diameter at the base is 24 feet, tapering upwards to 14 feet, and then springing out to a diameter of 20 feet; so as to form the platform, round the edge of which is fastened a palisade railing. On this platform will be placed the lamp-room, a polygon of 16 sides and about 15 feet diameter,

The tower is divided into seven floors, exclusive of the platform or gallery. The communication between the base and the first floor, about twenty feet from the ground, is by a spiral staircase, winding round the column in the centre. The space between the staircase and outer plates forming the tower, will be a solid mass of brickwork and concrete.

At this floor the interior brick casing is reduced to a thickness of 18 inches, and is carried up in a perpendicular line, leaving a circular room of 18 feet in diameter. The spiral staircase is then carried round the interior circumference of this floor to the second floor, which has likewise a casing of brick. The spiral staircases then pass from floor to floor in the same manner, until they reach the interior of the lamp-room.

The whole structure is to be lighted by 36 port-holes, each fitted with a pane of strong plate glass in the centre, and attached to the shell of the tower by hinges.

CAST-IRON LIGHT-HOUSE.

The tower is formed of 135 plates; the base plates have a surface of about 35 square feet; the plates decrease in proportion to the cone, each plate has a flanch or edge projecting inwards, and is joined together in the manner seen in Fig. 1—a horizontal section of a pair of plates, showing the joint. Fig. 2, a Sectional Elevation: the screws and nuts hold the plates together, and the hollow space between the flanches is filled with iron cement, and forms a perfectly air and water-tight joint.

The three upper floors following those cased with brick, have an interior casing of wrought iron, with an air space between the plates forming the tower, and the casing with mouldings and pilasters of oak.

In considering the many useful purposes to which iron is now applied, there is not one that can be more beneficial than its application to the construction of light-houses. How many of the colonies of Great Britain are surrounded by dangerous reefs and rocks, causing the destruction of numerous vessels yearly. Now these dangerous situations might be made comparatively safe by a lighthouse; and it is not generally known that a commodious and permanent structure of this kind can be made in England, and easily transported, at a comparatively trifling cost; whilst it will require little more foundation than levelling the spot on which it may be placed by a small number of men, and thus be constructed and set up within a few months.

HER MAJESTY ISABELLA II., QUEEN OF SPAIN.

The youthful Maria Isabella, who, at this moment, occupies the throne of Spain, is about thirteen years and a half old, having been born Oct. 10, 1830. In the general outline of her features, her Majesty is thought to resemble her father, Ferdinand, whom she succeeded Sept. 29, 1833. Mr. Haverty, in his amusing "Wanderings in Spain," thus describes her Majesty:—"She is, by no means, so beautiful as the Infanta, but is much fairer; her figure also is good, and her neck and arms worthy of a sculptor's study; and, although at that time no more than twelve years and six months old, she seemed to have sprung into womanhood. She was robed in white satin, waved with flowers of delicate tint, and wore a diadem of silver richly spangled with diamonds—the great golden crown having been placed on a table near the throne. Her train, which was of deep green velvet, lined with ermine, was borne by an officer of the household; and Madame Mina, the royal camarera and governante, walked behind her Majesty, dressed in the plain black costume of a Spanish lady." The following is another pen-and-ink sketch of her Majesty, from the same lively hand:—

On Sunday, in the Palace Chapel, where the music is invariably enchanting, I had an opportunity of seeing the Queen and her royal sister attend mass in public, as they always do on Sundays and great festivals. * * * At length martial music was heard in the court of the palace, and echoed through the spacious galleries; a train of priests in surplices entered and took their seats on benches along one side of the open central space; priests robed for the celebration of mass followed, with the venerable patriarch of the Indies in his oriental robes; the great lattice of the royal closet was drawn aside, and the young Queen and her sister appeared inside, on two thrones, that of the Infanta being at the Queen's left. When they knelt, they appeared quite at the front of the lattice, but when sitting, the Queen was partly concealed from those on the men's side of the chapel; and the amiable little Infanta seemed to devote, perhaps, too much of her attention to her royal sister, who was evidently the object of all her admiration and affection. They wore bonnets of green velvet, but on subsequent occasions, I frequently saw them wear the Spanish mantilla, of which the Queen is said to be particularly fond. When the Queen's name was mentioned in the prayers at mass, the train of priests turned round and bowed to her Majesty, but she only returned the salutation with a rapid inclination of the head; and in this, as well as in her other abrupt gestures, such as starting every moment from her seat, and tossing her head about violently, she displayed not only an extremely defective education, but, it is to be feared, a sullenness and violence of disposition also. In this respect, it is apprehended that she will but too strongly resemble her royal father, as she decidedly does in a certain coarseness of expression about the mouth and chin, if not in the general outline of her features. On one occasion, I saw her Majesty lose her temper so much, because her governess could not make her understand the parts of the office in her prayer-book, that she shut up the book in a pet, and refused to speak with her sister, who was gently endeavouring to soothe her anger.

ISABELLA II., QUEEN OF SPAIN.

MISS EDGEWORTH'S HOUSE.

Edgeworthstown is situated in the county Longford, and is the residence of Maria Edgeworth, who has done so much by way of illustrating the Irish character, as well as to benefit literature in general. It is a clean, well-ordered little place, and with its whitewashed houses, and the park and mansion of the great authoress, has an air of respectability and comfort unfortunately too often absent in many places of greater expectation in Ireland. This is to be attributed to the kindly feeling existing between the humblest cottager and the inmates of "the great house;" who justly feel that the interest of all parties is best cared for by so benevolent an arrangement. The house in which Miss Edgeworth resides is a handsome and convenient structure, reminding one of many such we meet about England; therefore it has no architectural peculiarities, except an ample commodiousness. It stands at a short distance from the main road, its three-storied front of white stucco catching the eye of the traveller between the trees on the roadside. The garden, extensive and well laid out, is opposite the windows of that side of the house where Miss

MISS EDGEWORTH'S HOUSE.

Edgeworth's own private apartments are situated. A lawn of some extent is opposite the back of the mansion, and shady walks, beneath well-grown trees, surround the thickly-planted park. In the hall are some family portraits, a few as ancient as the time of Elizabeth, and various Indian curiosities. The library is an exceedingly cheerful room, most plentifully stocked with books; and here, upon a small sofa, by the fireside, usually sits the authoress of so great a share of mental enjoyment for the world, at a little desk, with shelves, and flaps, and drawers—a complete multum in parvo—quietly attending to her correspondence, while before her lies Sir Walter Scott's pen, given to her by him when he visited Ireland, and in her company saw the far-famed lakes of Killarney.

HYDE PARK.

"Rus in urbe."

We recollect to have once chaperoned a French gentleman from Bayswater to Mile-end, on a tour de Londres, which he was very anxious to make, and of which, after many detours, we completed a portion in about ten hours' honest walking for the first day. So we went on for a week:—docks, tunnel, bridges, churches, public institutions, theatres, squares, parks, &c., we most sedulously explored, when, at last, we sat down to a quiet early dinner in that quarter of the west end which most agrees with, or administers to, the appetite of a foreigner. There was an evident disquiet on the part of our companion: we both remained silent for a few minutes, when at length we ventured to ask the question—"Well, sir! what do you think of our great city of London?" To which he replied, with the most perfect Gallic nonchalance, "Ma foi! c'est une bonne moitié de Paris." We arose hastily, paid the bill, and sullenly proceeded westward. At length we reached Hyde Park Corner, and there was a glorious sight to see:—the beauty, fashion, and the riches of the world combined in one most graceful galaxy. There is no scene in Europe which can compare with Hyde Park in this season, when its "living flowers," as the Malayan language gallantly calls the ladies, come forth—when > the glad summons of a genial ray

> Unbinds the glebe, and calls them out to day.

Enter the Park, and the first object which presents itself is the statue of Achilles—the hero

> Who in the shock of charging hosts unmov'd
> Amidst confusion, horrour, and despair,
> Examin'd all the dreadful scenes of war:
> In peaceful thought the field of Death survey'd,
> To fainting squadrons sent the timely aid,—
> Inspir'd repuls'd battalions to engage,
> And taught the doubtful battel where to rage!

Go on a little further, and mix with the most splendid throng of the world, and when you have taken two or three turns go home, and reflect that you have seen more loveliness, wealth, and distinction of all honourable kind than is to be met with on the face of the globe. Such is our Hyde-park on what we would call a brilliant day. La Strada di Toledo at Naples, and El Prado of Madrid may in some degree vie with it; but they are not equal in the splendour of their vehicles, the beauty of their fair occupants, the magnificence of our gallant chevalrie, and the thronging masses of pedestrians who

LITERATURE.

THE ENGLISH REVIEW; OR, QUARTERLY JOURNAL OF ECCLESIASTICAL AND GENERAL LITERATURE. No. I. Rivingtons.

Considering the number of quarterly journals now current in the British Isles, the first impression would naturally be on seeing the announcement of a new one, that the ground was already so fully pre-occupied as scarcely to leave standing-room for a fresh comer. This, we say, might, in ordinary cases, be the first impression, irrespective of any other consideration than that of mere number; but when we look at the various phases of opinion, as well theological as political, now presenting themselves in this country, we come to the conclusion that the above Review, as the organ principally of a most respectable, influential, and increasing party (if we may use such a term,) in the Anglican Church, is not uncalled for; nay, we think it calculated to supply a deeply-felt want. Independently, however, of any reference to peculiarities attaching to it in this respect, we shall remark upon its intrinsic worth and promises, as exhibited to us in this first number. And if this our preceding numbers shall continue to furnish us with articles as good, on the whole, as the present, we augur success to the undertaking. The principal papers are "The Knights Templars," "The Sees of Bangor and St. Asaph," "Additional Bishoprics," "The Agamemnon of Æschylus," "German Writers on the English Church," "Wordsworth's Theophilus Anglicanus," "Lord John Russell's Translation of Francesca da Rimini," &c.

The writer of the first paper has well discriminated, we think, the characters of Philippe-le-Bel, and our Henry VIII.; the one in reference to the suppression of the Templars, the other in reference to that of the monasteries. The reviewer has an observation respecting the latter monarch, the propriety of which will be at once acknowledged, that, "notwithstanding a series of acts unparalleled in the annals of any European kingdom, it is most unquestionable that the perpetrator's memory has been clouded of the corresponding need of universal reprobation. Sir James Mackintosh, it is true, has pointed a most quaint and lulling period at him; but other writers have either related his acts with indifference, or even with expiatory observations." Altogether, this is an interesting and ably written article, and upon a subject needing some elucidation. But the second is the article of the number. The reasoning of the writer why the proposed union of St. Asaph and Bangor should not be accomplished—why rather, indeed, there ought to be an increase, than a diminution of bishoprics, we take to be irresistible. We cannot even allude to the facts and positions on which his argument is founded; we can only say that if additional bishops proposed to be created should be found willing to enter upon their functions, and to discharge their sacred duties in the manner pointed out by the reviewer, we think there would generally be very little objection to the measure. The need of spiritual rule is manifold greater now than in the age of Henry VIII., when the Episcopate was last increased, not only by reason of our numbers (it is now 16,000,000 in England and Wales, it was then 4,000,000), but because of the multiplication and inveteracy of our religious parties, and of the development of new classes, it might almost be said, of new races of men, presenting peculiar, and all but insuperable forms of resistance to the teaching and unity of the Church. The third article is eminently useful in distinguishing the great object Æschylus had in view in raising pity and terror by his dramas, from that of Sophocles and Euripides. The former is said to have been the sensible attention and exhibition of heroical, political, and moral truth; the latter, the exhibition of suffering and the rousing of fear without any direct and immediate connexion with this practical lesson. In the fourth paper, the characteristic difference between the German and English mind in respect to religion is admirably traced. With regard to the remaining essays, our space admits only of our saying that they display much critical ability and tact, and an ample share of theological learning; and, in short, the publication itself, provided the articles are kept within a moderate compass as to length, bids fair to rival the best of our long-established "Quarterlies."

THE NOVELS OF JAMES FENIMORE COOPER, ESQ., complete in one volume. W. M. Clark.

This edition of the most popular novels of "the American Walter Scott," which we noticed at its commencement in terms of approbation, has just been completed. It comprises "The Pilot," "The Spy," "The Last of the Mohicans," "Lionel Lincoln," "The Pioneers," "The Prairie," "The Red Rover," and "The Water Witch;" illustrated with nearly 200 engravings. The volume extends to nearly 900 pages, or double that number of columns, of very small, but clear and readable type; and, taken as a whole, the book is a library in itself. We are happy to see that this creditable work is completed, since it leads us to infer that the share of public patronage awarded to the undertaking, has been of the same tenor as our commendation awarded at its outset. Altogether, we do not know of a more entertaining book-companion than the writings of the fine works of "The Fielding of the Sea," and we wish the enterprising publisher all success in this sound addition to cheap literature.

THE HAND-BOOK OF INDIA. By J. H. STOCQUELER. Allen and Co.

This volume is intended to present, in a synoptical form, "all the information respecting British India, which an individual proceeding to any one of the presidencies, might desire, at first, to possess." It opens with a chapter on Indian Chronology; then proceeds to the History of British India; Climate and Productions; Population, Manners, and Customs; Commerce and Government; Native States and Foreign Relations; the Civil Service; the Army and Navy and Marine; the Protestant Ecclesiastical Establishment; the Press; Preparations for an Outward Voyage; the Overland Passage, (a very interesting section); Travelling in India; Society, Expenditure, &c. Then come a Description and Itinerary of the Principal Places in India, with the several Establishments, Hotel Charges, Public Conveyances, and a variety of information for the traveller, the stranger, and the resident. Yet, it is not only a Guide-book, but, so nearly has the Editor conveyed information, that the work has much of the interest and variety of a journal of travel. We have countless excellent works on British India; but neither of them conveys the kind of information sought by travellers in so tangible a form as this Hand-book, which is succinct, but sufficiently copious throughout.

THE PICTORIAL GRAMMAR. By ALFRED CROWQUILL. Harvey and Darton.

This is, truly, a comic age. In the present instance we find Crowquill strewing the paths of Lindley Murray with the flowers of his fertile fancy—i. e.: many scores of comic illustrations of the leading points of English grammar. Thus, under Adjective, a lazy man is represented by a reader in a easy chair, &c.; a careless girl—at once attaching a joint of meat while they have turned from the table, &c. Some of the cuts are very droll, as the moods illustrated: indicative, a finger-post; imperative, a beadle; potential, a soldier; subjunctive, a weather-cock; infinitive, a lawyer. The book is a lively trifle, and may answer an educational as well as amusive purpose. We have heard of drinking tea by stratagem, and we do not see why grammar may not be imbibed with good humour.

AN ESSAY ON TOPOGRAPHICAL LITERATURE, &c. By JOHN BRITTON, F.S.A.

Of this work, extending to some seventy quarto pages, only fifty copies have been printed, "for the Wiltshire Topographical Society," an association of noblemen and gentlemen, formed for the express purpose of illustrating, by various publications, the topography, history, and antiquities of the county of Wilts. The present is the first of the society's publications; in addition to the Essay, it contains accounts of public records, glossaries, &c., so that it will not only be useful to the gentlemen who are collecting materials for certain parishes of Wiltshire, but it is calculated to be generally serviceable to the topographical student. In all public societies the start in their design is a great point achieved; and, probably, no individual could be found better qualified to commence Wilts than its veteran topographer, Mr. Britton, who possesses considerable collections for the county, in addition to his published works: though on the shady side of seventy, he is as ardent as ever, and commits these pages to the press in the hope of awakening emulation among his fellow countrymen, "to show them what has been done, what is left undone, and whence the best information is to be obtained, and how it is to be employed." As the first work of its kind, this essay merits especial attention; and we hope to see a similar volume produced for every county in England, as the best means of commencing the illustration of the topography and archæology of our country.

TANGIBLE ARITHMETIC AND GROMETRY. By HENRY BUTTER Simpkin and Co.

If this little book be not a "royal road," it is a very ingenious and successful attempt to teach the sciences of numbers and space by tangible objects, which, certainly, make upon the minds of children a more vivid and lasting impression than mere arbitrary signs. Mr. Butter does not claim any merit of discovery in this method, for the plan has often been used before; he had, for nearly twenty years, employed cubes for teaching counting and the multiplication-table; but it was not till recently that the idea of using them to teach fractions occurred to him. The little book is illustrated with cuts, and is sold with, or without, a box of cubes, accurately cut in cedar or mahogany, by steam power; and thus may be tangibly taught the several rules of arithmetic, and the formation of squares, triangles, cubes, prisms, pyramids, &c. The system is as pleasing is it is instructive, and as a good addition to the toys of science.

THE CHAIN RULE. By CHARLES LOUIS SCHONBERG. Wilson.

This is another attempt at the "royal road;" or, in other words, it is a simple mode of calculation, which is general in its application, and in which the working of a question does not rest upon any mental calculation or exertion whatever, as there is no dependence but on figures flowing from each other, and the result is always certain.

A SELECTION OF MASONIC PRAYERS. By the Rev. HENRY GEVILIS, M.A. Penalima.

A manual of such prayers as are usually required at masonic meetings, selected by the vicar of St. Neot's, and P.G. chaplain for the county of Cornwall, from his portfolio, which he had collected from various sources, since his initiation into the craft.

THE METROPOLITAN CHARITIES. Low.

Amidst the various extremes of wealth and want which meet in our vast metropolis, how gratifying it is to turn to the long list of Charitable, Benevolent, and Religious Societies; the Hospitals, Dispensaries, Penitentiaries, Annuity Funds, Asylums, Almshouses, Colleges, and Schools; all which contribute so essentially to the moral greatness of London. Within its radius, the Sovereign may be meanly housed, but a host of palaces have been reared for the reception of suffering humanity. In the preface to this little volume, it is sagely observed: "It was the remark of a distinguished foreign traveller, that in England the hospitals were palaces, and the palaces were hospitals. Whatever of sarcasm might be intended by the latter portion of this remark is far more than counterbalanced by the panegyric implied in the former; and, in later years, it is the glory of the age in which we live, that the lapse of time, while it has neutralized the sarcasm, has confirmed and enhanced the eulogy." Much as the luxurious character of our metropolis has been decried, let us not forget that in no city of the world is "the luxury of doing good" so extensively enjoyed as in London; and no where are the Samaritan oil and wine so freely administered to those who are lowermost in the wheels of vicissitude. The work before us will be of paramount importance in extending this sphere of usefulness; its object being, not so much to commend our National Charities, as to guide the benevolent in finding help for others, and to assist the afflicted and necessitous in seeking it for themselves. The man of feeling who, in reading his newspaper, is so struck with the cares of destitution detailed in its columns, that he forthwith sends a ten-pound note to the next police-office poor-box, would, in all probability, more frequently indulge in this luxury, were he in possession of the systematic means of doing good, such as every institution in the metropolis presents in a greater or less degree. With this volume in his hand, he may advance safely in the glorious work. In it he will find, first, as applicable to the most urgent and immediate need, the hospitals, dispensaries, and other medical charities; then the philanthropic and pecuniary societies; and lastly, the educational foundations and charity schools. Thus, the work will serve as a guide to those benevolent individuals who are willing to devote a portion of their time and toil to the relief of suffering humanity, by procuring admission into asylums for orphans, and into hospitals for the sick; and, who, by obtaining the seasonable loan which shall prevent the ruin of an industrious family, confer a far greater and more lasting benefit than any mere pecuniary gift. It may be as well to explain that the object of each charity is first stated, then its administration, and the names of its principal officers. The work is very carefully compiled, and beautifully printed.

QUADRUPLE FUN.—Tom Dibdin, the author, and celebrated punster, was one of the stewards at the Drury Lane Theatrical Fund Dinner, at which the Duke of York presided, in the time of Edmund Kean. He had arrived rather late, on a very miserable-looking nag, and his appearance altogether called forth some remarks and merriment from those at the windows. "Gentlemen," said he, on entering the room, "you must-n-t judge of anything by its looks; that's the pony that plays the marble horse in 'Giovanni in London,' and can get as much applause as any of you; it's the celebrated Graphy." "Graphy!" that's a strange name for a horse, Dibdin," said some one. "Most appropriate though," said the punster. "When I made up my mind to buy a horse, I said, I'll be-graphy; when I mounted him I was a top-o-graphy, when I want him to canter I say, ge-o-graphy; and when I wish him to stand still, and he w n't, I say, but you au-to-graphy; and therefore I think Graphy is a very proper name."—From Thirty Years passed among the Players in England and America." By Joe Cowell, comedian.

In the volumnous report on smoke, lately made in the House of Commons, by a select committee, some curious facts are mentioned; for example, Mr. Chandler, camellia grower, at Wandsworth, states that on account of the great increase of chimnies from manufactories in that vicinity, plants which formerly might be handled without any bad effect, now soil the hands to the greatest extent. Among other plants which formerly flourished, but will not now grow in the neighbourhood of the metropolis, are China roses, rhododendron hirsutum, rhododendron virginum, and many others of the prettiest varieties, now quite extinct. Mr. Anderson, the curator of the Physic Gardens at Chelsea, testifies to the noxious effects of what he calls the "bitter smoke" upon the trees of that establishment, particularly on evergreens, and on two magnificent cedars, which have so long been an ornament to the gardens, and form a very conspicuous object from the river. It appears that the sooty particles are attracted to and attached by the resinous exudations of the leaves, while the large surface of the foliage above prevents their being washed away by the rains, so that the functional action of the leaves is disturbed, if not entirely destroyed.

THE ISLE OF SPRINGS

The Isle of Springs! The Isle of Springs!
Whose mountain summits reach the sky,
Whose valleys, fann'd by zephyr's wings,
In cool, retiring shade lie.
The sun of freedom darts his rays
Her sable sons at length may smile!

The clanking fetters of the slave
Are struck from his enfeebled frame;
Proud clear their fall, our banners wave,
And tyrants quail the dread to name
Those fetters with consummate dire,
Corroding, cank'ring, mould'ring lie.

The bay, hath sound, with upward bound,
Sprung into life at Freedom's call!
Have Afric's children yet been found
To pierce the dun, fiducial pall
Who Slavery, with her bl ighting hand,
Had cast around the untaught land?

Ah, no! the handsmen's fetters lie
Prostrate beneath the reel of pow'r,
And treacle fall, and despots die,
In the resolving of an hour:
But pow'rs of mind of boundless sway
Lore not till centuries pass away.

Yet marvel not the "freed" doth bear
The west of thought upon his brow
Where did we had mad beaming e'er
Amongst those who were his masters now,
Where yet had Afric claim'd her own,
Or from the hired upraen one?

Where are our spirits soaring high,
In science and in martial fame?
Where our sons of poesy—
Our warriors of deathless name?
Where are our Solons, Newtons, all
Whom we a nation's boast do call?

Our sons think not of themes like these:
Our poetas—oh, be upon the name!—
They revel in inglorious ease,
Or signify urge to' enticing game—
Waste their young years in lost pursuits,
Then fall, like summer's wither'd fruits.

Oh, grant me but to know some power
Will rouse Liber calous hearts to shame;
Teach them to taste the fleeting hour,
And stamp it with some deed of fame;
Then might my spi it take it wings,
And flee away, fair Isle of Springs!

TO PRESERVE MEAT WITH TREACLE.

Put a piece of meat into a vessel of treacle—turn it once in two or three days; at the end of a month or two, or even longer, it will be found as good, and more pleasant, than if it had been salted. This simple mode of preserving animal food was discovered a few years ago, by Don Ilox Valenzula, curate of Bucanramanga, in South America. The meat will retain all its juices in perfection.

HAPPINESS.

Oh! mortales, who talk of happiness and self-respect innate in every sphere of life, and shedding on every grain of dust on God's highway—so smooth below your carriage wheels, so rough beneath the naked feet bethink yourselves that there are spots of the thousands breathing stuck, with painful toil. Go, teachers of content and honest pride, into the mine—the mill—the forge—the squalid depths of deepest ignorance, and utmost abyss of man's neglect—and see if you can any hopeful plant spring up in so sad soil, that it extinguishes the soul s torch as fast as it is kindled! Oh! Pharasees of the nineteen hundredth year of Christian Knowledge, who soundingly appeal to human nature, and to what it can be human first! Take heed it has not been transformed, during the slumber of generations, into the nature of beasts.—Martin Chuzzlewit

NIGHT IN THE CASTLE OF HEIDELBERG.

After supper, our little party left the inn to visit the castle by moonlight, and were well repaid for the toil of once more ascending to it. It was a lovely scene—the lofty towers and walls stood in relief against the serene and softly-lighted sky, and the moon soone through the open and paneless windows; the old and shattered bason in the court of the castle, overgrown with weeds and foliage, on the rim of which, they say, the fairies have been seen to dance on moonlit nights, was dimly seen, but the fountain in the flower-garden was sparkling in the moonbeams. All was still, save the ever-murmuring Neckar, and the occasional baying of the distant watchdog. We lingered long within the precincts of the time and warworn edifice, in its shady walks and on its lofty terraces; and at length quitted it with feelings of regret. Thus closed a day which has been one of the most pleasant of my pilgrimage. None will, however, I am sure, afford me more pleasure in the retrospect, not one will occupy a more interesting page in my book of recollection.—WILKIE'S Wanderings in Germany.

CUSTOMS OF THE JEWS.

It was customary amongst the Jews, and enjoined by the great head of the Jewish theocracy, that their children should be taught the great moral law—that it should be imprinted on their foreheads and written on their door-posts; thus being publicly established to bread and open view. Thus, should come to a knowledge of those laws in which their children were taught.

The Chinese say, "good sayings are like pearls strung together: inscribe them on your walls, and regard them night and day as wholesome admonition."

Next to having enjoyed happiness ourselves, is the consciousness of having bestowed it on others.—SIR WALTER SCOTT.

A DANGEROUS PRECEDENT.

Two or three days ago a verdict of "Unsoundness of mind!" was found against a man, for, in the first place, that "he was ignorant of the value of money," and, secondly, that all he cared for was "comfortable eating, comfortable drinking, comfortable lodging, comfortable clothing, and a comfortable pipe." The word "comfortable" was always in his mouth. If a man is to be found lunatic for this last peculiarity, we ask—who in safe?—Punch.

When Louis XIV. was with the court one day mounted on a spirited horse accidentally gave him a blow. The King, in the first impulse of passion, struck the dragoon several times with his cane. The soldier, deeply affected, presented the pommel of his pistol to Louis, saying, "Sire, you have taken my honour, take my life!" The King replied, "Comrade, forget, and I will make reparation." The dragoon was rapidly promoted.

DISTRESS.

Distress! associate of all human kind!
To cairns we wend our steps, and to the wind;
From thy assaults no garrison can shield;
To thy domain must every mortal yield;
Thou wast at whose approach the wretch reigns,
And haunt'st the cottager on lonely plains;
No breast so sacred but thy power invades.
And each frail creature through thy river wades. NOTES.

EFFECTS OF GRIEF.

No man who is oppressed with grief can be supposed capable of exercising his judgment at all times correctly; every fresh misfortune excites an irresistible desire for relief; till nature, worn out, hopeless, dismayed, and terrified at the threatening aspect of many a bursting cloud, wishes to die.

THE EVILS OF LUXURY.

The luxury of man, revenges itself upon its capacity, and brings forth fever, gout, rheumatism, and brings out almost all the contents of Pandora's box, to infest the human species in every part of the civilized world. Some authors say physic and physicians are necessary evils; they certainly are so, but we, by our excess and intemperance, make them necessary. A young spendthrift considers the law, with its writs and its bailiffs, one of the greatest nuisances, but let him be frugal and a better economist, and the evil ceases. The philosopher, Pythagoras, after having travelled over India, Italy, and Sicily, asserted that the most remarkable circumstance he had remarked in his travels, was a people who made two meals a day.—Philosopher.

THE CHIEF ATTRACTION.

A cheerful temper, joined with innocence, will make beauty attractive, knowledge delightful, and wit good-natured. It will lighten sickness, poverty, and infirmities, convert ignorance into amiable simplicity, and render deformity agreeable.

TURNPIKE ROADS.

The aggregate length of the turnpike roads in Great Britain has been calculated to be 25,000 miles, at a general breadth of from 50 to 60 feet. The cost per mile of keeping these roads in repair differs considerably in different counties, being in the neighbourhood of London as much as £400, in Wales at £30, and in Yorkshire £60. The average on all is about £250 a mile. Nearly all the road trusts are in debt for borrowed money, and it is supposed that the debt averages £230 a mile, or probably for the whole of the turnpike roads £6,000,000 sterling.

THE OLDEST AND LARGEST OAK.

The senior of European oaks is, we are told, growing in the neighbourhood of Saintes. It is 60 feet in height; its diameter near the surface is 25 feet; at a height of about six feet the trunk measures 20 in diameter, and at the point where the main branches spring it diminishes to three feet. An apartment 16 feet deep, and as many high, with a door and window, has been formed in the trunk. The age of this oak is supposed to be 2000 years at least.—United Service Gazette.

TEMPLE OF CARNAC.

Giant columns have been swept away like reeds before the mighty avalanche, and one hardly guesses them; said they ever hall, who shall describe it? Its dimensions 170 by 329; the height of the central avenue of columns 66 feet, exclusive of their pedestals; the total number of columns that supported its roof, 134! These statistics may give some idea of its vastness; but of its grandeur and beauty, none. Every column is sculptured, and all have been richly painted.—Lord Lindsay's Letters on Egypt.

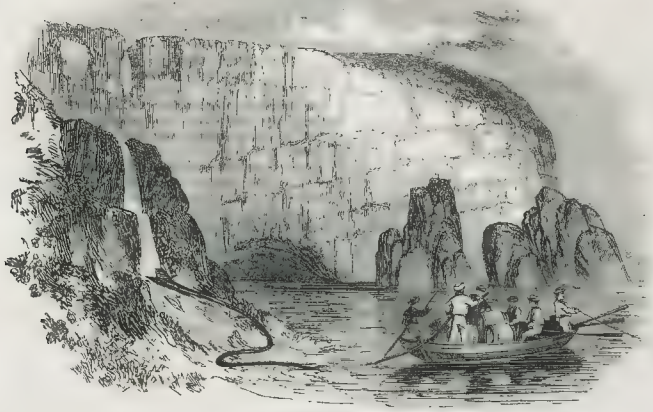
WOMAN'S INFLUENCE.

Oh, woman! the man of old was hardly wrong when he declared that thy power was greater than any other on earth. It is indeed great: thou hast power over man in all intimate and endearing relationships, instructing him by precept and example, and drawing him from the rough and the rugged path by thy own beauty and gentleness. It requires but that thy education should be such that Truth should be thy attendant, and then wouldst thou be invincible. As it is, thy power is a vast and wonderful agency only by being weak, conquering by being gentle. Binding by kindness and compassion, thy power is like an enchanted circle, beyond which none can pass, though thou boldest them in no restraint, for the chains are nothing firmer than a wife's, a daughter's, or a sister's love.—Woman a Worth.

JOYS OF SUMMER.

Having taken lodgings at some watering-place, you discover "the quietest apartments in the world!" are bounded on the north by a key bugle, on the south by a trunkmaker, on the east by a poultry-yard, and on the west by the railway terminus. Your landlady has certainly no children of her own, but she has five of her daughters—two with the whooping cough, and three with a piano. You also discover that a pound avoirdupois of London, consists of ten ounces at the sea side. The landlord has taken the temperance pledge, but the landlady has not; consequently the one takes your wine and brandy, and the other your sugar and tea. If you wish to ascertain the wholesale price of crockery or glass, break a plate or tumbler, and you are sure to be charged for the whole set

THE AZORES AND MADEIRA.



WATERING WITH PADDLE-BOX BOATS, AT ST. MARY'S.

[THE AZORES AND MADEIRA.

Her Majesty's steam-vessel, the Styx, has left Woolwich to complete the survey of these very interesting islands, as we announced in our paper of March 2. There doubtless remain many attractive sites to be visited, the results of which we may have, in due time, to report. The Illustrations we are now about to present to the reader, refer to the completed portion of the survey; and are a continuation of the series of illustrations commenced at page 132.

The first engraving represents a portion of the island of St. Mary's, one of the third group, which is seldom visited by ships, especially men-of-war, and is, consequently, but little known. The capital, Villa-da Ponta, is a wretched little town perched on the top of a hill, in a deep bay. In many parts of the island, rivulets pour over rocks into the sea, in a large volume, enabling a ship to water by means of her own boats. The place chosen by the Styx for that purpose was a bay on the north side, represented in the engraving: it is an interesting spot, surrounded on all sides by high cliffs; the country above being only accessible at one point, in a ravine, at the bottom of which runs an inconsiderable stream; whilst other streams rush down the sides of the cliffs. Here the operation of watering was managed by means of Capt. Smith's paddle-box boats, with which all war-steamers are now fitted: in this case, the Styx boats lay off the waterfall, and by means of a hose, one extremity of which communicated with the water of the stream, and the other with the casks in the boat, by which simple means a large quantity of water was procured with little trouble.

Geologically considered, St. Mary's is attractive, as it differs materially from the other islands; secondary formations, of which they are destitute, are found here: the limestone contains a large quantity of fossil remains of the shells of the cardium and Venus tribes, and similar to those met with at Cintra, in the same latitude, on the neighbouring continent. The limestone is procured in sufficient quantity to supply St. Michael's, and some of the other islands, with lime for building; and in the neighbouring rocks are to be seen some veins of fine white marble.

The second illustration shows a Caldeira at Flores, and a specimen of the mountain scenery of that island. The caldeira is the crater of the extinct volcano, from which, in all probability, the island was originally thrown up: it is now filled with water, and forms a magnificent mountain reservoir, or lake. The sides, which are very steep, are clothed with box, cedar, and faya, indigenous to the island, and which present a rich and cultivated appearance not to be looked for in a wild district, almost destitute of wood scenery. The water of the lake is deep and clear, and on its surface may often be seen great numbers of sea-gulls, whose cries, echoed from the sides of the cliff, have a strange effect. The caldeira is situated in the southern part of the island, and is distant from the town of Largens about five miles. The surrounding country presents a singular contrast, being, for the most part, flat and uninteresting, with the exception of the sea-coast, which presents the bold and rugged aspect so common in the Western Islands.

CALDEIRA, AT FLORES.

Terceira, the subject of the third engraving, is one of the central group, and the principal island: it contains two bays, those of Angra and Praya; the latter is the most spacious, and affords the best anchorage, but Angra being the capital of the Azores, is most frequented. This bay is somewhat picturesque. At the left hand entrance is a high mountain (Monte Brasil), the face of which has been worn away by the continued action of the sea, until the caldeira on the summit is thrown open, and presents an extraordinary appearance. The town is regularly and well built: it contains many fine edifices and well paved streets, which latter are a rarity among the Azorean towns. Although Angra is the best town in the islands, it contains fewer English residents than any of the others. The place is well fortified; there is a line of forts along the sea-wall; the Castle of St. Sebastian is strong, and there is a citadel placed on an eminence looking over the town. During the civil war which lately distracted Portugal, Terceira was noted for its staunch adherence to the cause of Donna Maria and Don Pedro; a considerable fleet was refitted at Angra, when other ports were shut against him; and at Praya was raised an army of volunteers, who successfully resisted the landing of a considerable force by Don Miguel. There is a good mole and landing-place for boats at Angra, so that vessels may be laden there in rough weather without much danger. The island has a good trade in oranges but not equal to that of St. Michael's. Of late years, the orange crop has been much injured by a species of insect which infests the trees, and renders the fruit unsaleable; and, to get rid of the disease, many hundred orange trees have been cut down. The adjacent country presents some fine scenery; and on the top of a lofty hill, immediately behind the town, is an old fort, built during the Spanish interregnum; it is now in ruins, but has a very picturesque appearance.

LANDING-PLACE AT ANGRA, TERCEIRA.

The fourth illustration carries the reader to Madeira, to the localities known as the Ponta da Cruz and Cabo Girao. The former—the point of the Cross—is the southernmost point of the island: it consists of an outstanding rock, the base of which is washed by the sea; on the summit is placed a small iron cross, which is venerated by the fishermen and boatmen, who, in passing the holy emblem, reverently take off their caps, and implore protection and success during their voyage. The high cape, or headland, beyond the Point of the Cross, is the Cabo Girao, the loftiest cape in the island, being about 18 or 16 feet above the sea which washes its base: part of the cliff has given way, and now forms considerable ledges of earth, at the base of the cape; one of which, Faja dos Padres, produces the best malmsey in the island; although all the ledges, from their southern aspect and the reflected heat from the cliffs above, yield fine wine. From the side of the cliff is quarried the best building-stone; the ascent is by ladders, and the stone is conveyed to the town of Funchal and elsewhere in boats; but the whole process is attended with more or less risk of life, and considerable expense. Between the the cape and the Point of the Cross is situated one of the oldest towns in the island, and is pointed out as the spot where Gonsalves Zarco, the discoverer of Madeira, put in for shelter with his boats during his exploratory expedition. The surrounding country is covered with vineyards and quintas, (country houses,) and is one of the best wine districts in the island.

ANNIVERSARIES.

THE BATTLE OF CULLODEN.

"Drummossie Muir, Drummossie day,
A waeful day it was to me!
For there I lost my father dear,
My father dear and brethren three."

Tuesday last was the 98th anniversary of the celebrated battle fought on the estate of Culloden, about three miles north-east of Inverness, on April 16, 1746, and which is memorable as having put an end to the Rebellion. On the night preceding the Highlanders had intended to surprise the Duke of Cumberland, in his camp, at Nairn; but this scheme having failed, they took up a position on the Moor of Drummossie, their left wing towards the house of Culloden, where the declivity of the hill was soft and marshy, their right slightly protected by a stone wall. The ground was unfavourable, and the Highlanders were weakened by hunger and fatigue, so that it had been judged expedient to withdraw to the hills; but the difficulty of finding subsistence for the men, and the importance of protecting Inverness, determined the Prince Charles Edward, and his councillors, to venture a battle. Drawn up in a line in the position above mentioned, while waiting for the signal to charge, the Highlanders suffered greatly from the English artillery. Exasperated, at last, beyond endurance, the centre rushed forward; and the last charge of the Highlanders, under their patriarchal discipline, and with their peculiar arms, is thus vividly described in Chambers's "History of the Rebellion":—

"A lowland gentleman, who was in the line, and who survived till a late period, used always, in relating the events of Culloden, to comment with a feeling of something like awe upon the terrific and more than natural expression of rage which glowed in every face and gleamed in every eye, as he surveyed the extended line at this moment. Notwithstanding that the three files of the front line of English poured forth their incessant fire of musketry; notwithstanding that the cannon, now loaded with grape-shot, swept the field as with a hail-storm; notwithstanding the flank fire of Wolfe's regiment, onward were the headlong Highlanders, flinging themselves into, rather than rushing upon, the lines of the enemy, which, indeed, they did not see for the smoke till involved among their weapons. It was a moment of dreadful, agonising suspense, but only a moment, for the whirlwind does not sweep the forest with greater rapidity than the Highlanders cleared the line. They swept through and over that frail barrier almost as easily and instantaneously as the bounding cavalcade brushes through the morning labours of the gossamer which stretch across its path; not, however, with the same unconsciousness of the events! Almost every man in their front rank, chief and gentleman, fell before the deadly weapons which they had braved; and although the enemy gave way, it was not till every bayonet was bent and bloody with the strife.

"When the first line had been completely swept aside, the assailants continued their impetuous advance till they came near the second, when, being almost annihilated by a profuse and well directed fire, the shattered remains of what had been, but an hour before, a numerous and confident force, at last submitted to destiny by giving way and flying. Still, a few rushed on, resolved rather to die than thus forfeit their well-acquired and dearly-estimated honour. They rushed on, but not a man ever came in contact with the enemy. The last survivor perished as he reached the points of the bayonets." It is said, that in one place, where a very vigorous attack had been made, their bodies were afterwards found in layers three or four deep.

The right wing of the Highlanders, advancing at the same time, was attacked in flank by the English cavalry and broken; the left withdrew almost without sharing in the fight. About 500 men were killed on each side. The battle, however, was decisive; the Prince fled to the mountains, and some days after, gave notice to his partisans to provide for their own safety, declining to continue the contest with 8000 men, who were ready to meet him in Badenoch. This memorable event has given rise to many plaintive popular songs; a verse from one of which, pathetically lamenting the horrors of war, has just been quoted.

WATER-TOMB AT TELMESSUS.

THE XANTHIAN EXPEDITION.

Some very interesting intelligence has lately been received of the fate of the Xanthian party, sent out from this country, to collect antiquarian treasures, from the district of Xanthus, intended hereafter to enrich our great National Museum. Of the object of the Expedition, and the labours of its superintendent, Mr. Fellowes, the celebrated traveller, we presented to our readers an illustrated description in No. 41 of our Journal.

By the news just received, the Xanthian party, after contending with almost insurmountable difficulties, appear to have finally mustered with the collected treasures at the mouth of the river on the 12th of March, when her Majesty's ship Medea, Commander Warden, ran over from Macri to take in her valuable cargo Commander Warden, for some five weeks previous, had been indefatigably engaged in personally superintending the packing and removal of the marbles from the valley where they have been strewn about and undisturbed for centuries, save by the hand of time; but it came on to blow so heavily, that in towing the lighter over the bar the halsers parted and the pinnace and two cutters got swamped and sunk. Several of the party got blown violently out of the boats by the sea, and Mr. Hoare, a mate of the Queen, and three men were, with difficulty, rescued from a watery grave. Unable to proceed with the embarkation, or even to communicate with the shore, the Medea had to retrace her way back, leaving some thirty officers and men with the ship's boats, besides the exploring party on the sands, exposed to the inclemency of the weather, without any other shelter than the bushes thereabouts (for all but two small tents had been already shipped), until the 15th, when the weather lulled sufficiently to enable the steamer to return, and by the 18th every one was snugly housed on board, with twenty cases of marbles and casts, leaving on the beach some other seven cases containing the unwieldy portions of the horse and chimera tombs, which must remain until such time as a larger vessel is sent to hoist the same in. It is currently rumoured that the Waraplo, 50, has proceeded from Athens for this purpose. The steamer then steered for Macri, to water, and on the 20th she hove to off Rhodes, where the captain and Mr. Fellowes landed, to return the Pacha of the place the acknowledgments of the British Government for the facilities and protection he had afforded the expedition, the Xanthus district forming a portion of the pachalic of Rhodes, where also the lighters were left. On the evening of the 20th the steamer again proceeded on her voyage, intending to make the best of her way to Malta, which, however, owing to contrary winds, she did not reach till the 28th, the vessel was then found to have suffered so considerably, as to require a thorough overhauling before she proceeds for England.

Mr J. H. Allan, in his beautiful "Tour in the Mediterranean," which we have lately taken occasion to notice, describes the country in which the above interesting operations have been carried on, thus —

"On coming to the narrow entrance of the harbour of Macri, we were becalmed under the lee of the highland; and, as there appeared very little chance of any wind again reaching us, we got out our sweeps, and pulled gradually into the magnificent basin of the ancient city of Telmessus, whose placid waters were splendidly illuminated by the full moon, which, since we had commenced rowing, had broken out through the banks of clouds, and favoured our exertions, enabling us to come to anchor before midnight, about one mile from the shore.

"At a small mole, to which were moored a schooner and a number of caïques, we found the Saints, where, on showing our papers, we were at once allowed to land. On a part of the shore to the west of the village, covered with oleander, we saw the remains of the theatre in good preservation, most of the seats being still complete, although much overgrown with brushwood. The three entrances to the proscenium are also standing. The openings to the diazoma for the common people, in the upper part of the theatre, still preserve their arched ways, but have been much shaken by earthquakes. There were 28 rows of seats, 15 above and 13 below the diazoma; the diameter being 254 feet. Many excavations are found close to it, hollowed into the rock on a lofty terrace, and commanding a fine view of the port."

We have copied one of Mr. Allan's effective lithographs, which represents one of the most recently discovered tombs at Telmessus, and is thus described —

"Taking our boat, we rowed to the other side of the village to a tomb standing in the sea, and nearly surrounded by reeds and rushes obscuring it from view, except to those approaching it from seaward. It is composed of but two immense blocks of stone; the lower square, with ends cut to resemble panels, the upper forming a roof in shape like an inverted boat, the side and keel being ornamented with bas reliefs, now considerably weather-worn. The sanctity of the grave had long been violated, and the ashes of the dead scattered to the winds.

Mr. Allan's Tour includes Malta, Dalmatia, Turkey, Asia Minor, Grecian Archipelago, Egypt, Nubia, Greece, Ionian Islands, Sicily, Italy, and Spain—a more attractive route the traveller can scarcely desire. It is literally strewn with classic antiquities and picturesque beauties—the contrast of decaying art and the never-ending vivid variety of nature. Our author brings to his task the talent for sketching gracefully, so that his volume is most unsparingly, as well as cleverly, illustrated with lithographs and vignettes on wood.

PERSONALITIES IN PARLIAMENT.

At this time we should regret the loss of time occasioned by discussions in Parliament that are exclusively personal, were they not compensated by asserting or maintaining principles that are at all times valuable—principles that must be scrupulously maintained, or the confidence we place in the personal honour, if not in the mental wisdom of our public men, will be utterly destroyed. If such discussions assert the value of truth, by bringing down well merited scorn on the heads of those by whom truth is wilfully outraged, we do not regret the space of time they occupy, though we certainly do lament that they should occur at all.

The greater part of the legislative sittings of this week has been consumed in—not discussions—but violent altercations, caused by recklessness of assertion on the part of a member of the House, unaccompanied by the ability to prove what was asserted. The questionings as to having made these assertions, the acknowledgment of having done so, and, with the acknowledgment, the repetition of the offensive charges, and the undertaking to support them, concluded the first part of the transaction. The next was the sudden abandonment, of the attempt to prove, and the disappearance from the House of the party making the charges, followed by a short discussion as to what was to be done under such unusual circumstances, ending in an adjournment of the matter, to give time for cooler reflection; and the last was the result of that consideration.

All this has occupied the time that might have been devoted to the business of the nation, might have been appropriated to the discussion of "measures," instead of "men;" and the recurrence of such interruptions to the progress of business is one of the most fruitful causes of what we have before treated as the "Delays of Legislation." But then, on the other hand, the character of public men is in some degree public property, and it is of no small importance that they should not be calumniated without cause; the least that can be demanded from an accuser is, that he should be prepared with proof of his accusation. In this, Mr. Ferrand has failed; he has recklessly charged men with absolute criminality; he has totally failed to prove his charges; and, as a public man, he may be considered as extinguished.

The lesson furnished by the public career of this gentleman—for we may speak of him as departed from public life—is an instructive one. He entered Parliament as one of the Conservative party, at the time when it placed a Ministry in power after a long absence from it: his first speeches were remarkable for their bold, uncompromising, "out and out," attacks on the manufacturing interest; they were loudly cheered and applauded by his party, and he became a sort of lion of the day; but it was for a brief space only; the same assertions that gained him applause for their boldness, were the cause of his being dropped by his first backers, as unsafe; the rejoinders of the accused parties were in many cases so complete and crushing, that the feeling which first hailed the advent of Mr. Ferrand as an able ally, cooled down into very equivocal and doubtful support. He might have continued in the House, tolerated, if not admired—a frequent, if not an influential speaker—had he not in an evil hour ventured to make distinct charges against Sir James Graham and Mr. Hogg, which, if he could have proved, would have expelled the latter from the House, and have subjected the former to an impeachment. He spoke what was undoubtedly his belief; but what will sometimes create a moral conviction, is frequently not sufficient to establish a legal proof. The House of Commons is an assembly that in personal matters will tolerate nothing vague or uncertain. On national, social, and political questions, the arguments and assertions are often vague and inconclusive enough—but once trench on personal character, the proofs of the assertions must be at hand, and must be incontrovertible, or all is lost—the charge fails, and the accuser himself is ruined. This has been the case with Mr. Ferrand; he is probably sincere—for hypocrisy displays more prudence than he has exhibited—but violent in his sincerity; and though his party looked on with tolerable complacency while his denunciations only fell on their opponents, it became quite a different matter when they were poured upon themselves. Their indifference was roused to action; the Opposition, whom he had long since made his enemies, began the attack; the Ministerialists, whom he had latterly alienated, did not defend him; and he did not attempt to defend himself. If a man possessed the united powers of a Burke, a Pitt, and a Canning—though he spoke with the tongue of men and of angels—he could not stand up, isolated and unsupported, with the general feeling of a popular assembly against him. The unit must sink in the conflict with numbers; and so has Mr. Ferrand fallen. It will hardly take the public by surprise, and in political circles was long since foreseen and foretold.

Most heartily do we wish that these personal contests occurred less frequently. We have seen their increase of late with much regret. The affairs of the nation are urgent, and too little is done at most, not to make us lament anything that has the effect of making that little less. But we must always recollect that what is conducted by merely human agency will always be liable to human imperfections. Whatever may be said and written about the dignity of Legislatures, and the necessity of calmness and order in their discussions, it is not the less true that they are but assemblies of individuals, and must necessarily at times exhibit signs of the presence of individual passions. They are not abstractions, but realities. We foresee that there will be much idle talk and idler writing about the want of "dignity" of such displays of feeling as we have this week seen exhibited in the House of Commons. There are many who draw their notions of legislatures and assemblies from their schoolboy reading of Greece and Rome, of people we see only through the veil of history, which allows the great incidents to be visible, the pettinesses that accompanied those events being sunk, lost and perished; there were no means then of preserving and handing down every hasty word and impatient gesture of the actors on the scene. Judging modern things by an ancient standard, which, after all, is but an imaginary one, writers and speakers are too ready to accuse the legislative bodies of modern days and nations of a want of some undefined quality they call dignity. Did human and individual passion never invade the Roman Forum? The Gracchi were murdered in that "august" assembly, much as the Parisian mob massacred a President of the Revolutionary Convention; and as much as we have left of the Greek orators shows us that they "fulmined over Greece" of old in terms as personal as any that are used by Deputies, or Representatives, or Members of Congress at the present time. To much of the cant that is spoken about dignity and decorum, and so forth, we are therefore callous. Where a departure from the higher ground of public questions, to individual matters, vindicates a principle which is the life and soul of all popular discussion—truth—we cannot think that the time given to them is absolutely wasted, though the immediate consequences may only affect a Member for Knaresborough, a Member for Beverley, or even a Secretary for the Home Department.

ST. JAMES'S BAZAAR—EXHIBITION OF DECORATIVE WORKS.

EXHIBITION OF DECORATIVE WORKS AT THE ST. JAMES'S BAZAAR.

On Monday last the handsome and capacious building, in St. James's-street, known as "the St. James's Bazaar," was opened to the public for the exhibition of decorative works sent in, pursuant to notices issued in June, 1843, by her Majesty's Commissioners on the Fine Arts. The bazaar is well adapted for the purpose, forming one extensive saloon, nearly 300 feet long, by 40 wide. Along the centre is placed a screen, against the sides of which are ranged many specimens of carved work; whilst the painted glass and designs for ornamental pavement occupy respectively the positions afforded by the windows and walls of the building. Supernumerary articles, and such as have not strict reference to the conditions of the notices, are, by permission of the Commissioners, exhibited with the rest.

The immediate object of this exhibition is to assist the Commissioners in the selection of persons to be employed in the finishing and decoration of "the New Palace at Westminster," as the Houses of Parliament, now building, are somewhat inappropriately termed. The number of specimens in the catalogue is 170; and among the artists are several highly distinguished in their respective departments. There are upwards of 50 designs for the principal door of the House of Lords, of various degrees of merit, but in few instances presenting fine specimens of carving. Next are about 20 designs for stained glass windows, some of which entitle our artists to higher rank in glass-staining than our continental neighbours are ready to admit: there are perfect windows, but there are other specimens, in the catalogue, which are portions of the respective designs. The remaining items are designs for pavements, metal castings, decorative painting, inlaid flooring, &c. The pavements are by Chamberlain, of Worcester; Minton and Co., Stoke-upon-Trent; and Singer and Co., Vauxhall. One of the most noticeable items is a specimen of encaustic painting on Keene's cement, by Mr. F. Sang. Another striking novelty is Mr. Owen Jones's plan for the principal floors of the Houses of Parliament, drawn upon a scale of 3 inches to 10 feet; in which it is proposed that the halls and galleries be paved with British marbles, of which there are specimens from Derbyshire and Staffordshire: the corridors are to be floored with encaustic tiles and porcelain mosaics; and other portions with asphalte; throughout Mr. Jones's design, the geometrical combinations are very beautiful, and the colours will be very gorgeous.

One of the most complete designs is No. 78, for the decoration of the Queen's Robing-room; by Mr. Richard Popplewell Pullan. This design exhibits the style of decoration of the 14th century applied to an entire apartment, and is, on the most part, based on the suggestions thrown out in Mr. Barry's report. The apartment, 38 feet by 35 feet, has been so arranged that the whole would present an historical series of royal personages, the portraits of celebrated sovereigns, and paintings of remarkable events, from the time of William I. to that of her present Majesty. One side of the room is shown, divided into five compartments, by elaborately carved oak arches occupied by white marble statues. These compartments are alternately filled by pedigrees on a gold diapered ground, and pictures of events in which the sovereign has taken a personal part, within a scarlet border. A rich scroll cornice, on a gold ground, runs round the room, with the monogram of the word Anglia in the centre; and labels, with the names of the Patron Saints of England, St. George and St. Edward, Anglia are introduced at intervals, bearing their shields. The ceiling is to be framed in square panels, with bosses at the intersections, scarlet and gold, with the bearings of the House of Brunswick. A low seat is shown round the room, upholstered in scarlet velvet morocco, and other wood-work, may be of carved oak, relieved with colours and gilding.

Altogether, this exhibition is creditable to the taste of our decorative artists; but it is, we trust, the grand courser of better things.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

PORTUGAL.

Our information from Portugal is up to the 17th instant. Almeida continues in the possession of Bomfim, and no serious impression evidently has been made on it by bombardment, as orders appear to have been issued to proceed immediately to the storming of the place. The result of any attempt by assault is very doubtful. The Portuguese, like the Turks, though not deficient in bravery, are proverbially noted for their efficiency behind stone walls, and one Portuguese behind the walls of Almeida may be cut down a fully equal to three of his countrymen on the outside. The forces under the Queen's generals are not much more than three times the number of those at Bomfim's disposal. There have been a number of persons arrested in the vicinity of Lisbon, chiefly in the act of leaving the city with a view of proceeding to Santarem, to get up a pronunciamento. At Lamego disturbances are said to have taken place, and a guerilla to have been established there.

WEST INDIES.

We have received a file of West India journals, containing intelligence from Jamaica to the 24th ultimo, Barbadoes March 30, and Guiana March 26, brought by the Trent mail-packet, which arrived at Southampton on Wednesday morning at half-past twelve a.m. She brings forty-seven passengers, and has had a tolerable passage. The Trent also brings 539 dollars, 318 ounces of silver, 2 ounces gold dust, and 1186 doubloons.

There is little news from Barbadoes, but the little is good. The weather had changed, rain had fallen, and the hopes of the planters had brightened.

A vessel had arrived at Falmouth with ice, and that article is on sale at that place at 3d per lb.

In consequence of the severe and long-continued drought, the inhabitants of some districts have suffered from want of food and water. From Manchester we learn from a letter now before us, that what was scarcity in the month of January has become a degree of evil approaching to famine. Provisions, meat, flour, sugar, and other descriptions of American produce have been plentiful and cheap in the principal towns, and have rendered their inhabitants independent of the supply of indigenous articles of food. For water, persons in some parts of the island have had to travel miles, and stock to be driven considerable distances.

The Planters' Bank of Jamaica has declared a dividend of 8 per cent. upon the half-year's transactions to the 31st of December last, and carried £2693 15s. 1d. to the reserved fund. This establishment has been returning 10 per cent. per annum to its shareholders for some time past.

Several fires have occurred—one at Garbrand Hall estate, in St. Thomas-in-the-East, which destroyed the Great House, or Proprietor's residence, when proprietors used to reside in the island; and two in St. Andrew's, by which a cane piece and eight negro houses and 120 acres of grass were destroyed. These fires were accidental.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—MONDAY.

Their lordships met at the usual hour.

Several petitions were presented.

Lord CAMPBELL, at the request of Lord BROUGHAM, postponed the second reading of his Bankers and Cheques Bill to next Monday week.

The Marquis of NORMANBY stated that he had been satisfied by the Noble President of the Board of Control [illegible] the subject of the Gwalior papers—an additional one of which was laid on the table by the Duke of Buccleuch.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—MONDAY.

The Speaker having taken the chair, Mr. BERNAL took his seat for Hastings.

The North British Railway Bill was read a third time and passed, after a division, carried by 102 against 28.

Other railway bills were advanced.

Sir J. GRAHAM moved the second reading of the Factories (No 2) Bill.—Mr. T. DUNCOMBE contended that the only proper way of dealing with this bill would be to refer it to a select committee.—Sir ROBT. PEEL said that, upon looking into this subject, he had come to the conclusion that he had been wrong in his first impression, and that it would be his duty to oppose Lord Ashley's restriction.—Mr. M. PHILIPS gave the bill his cordial support, but cautioned the House that if they thus meddled with the regulation of labour in factories, they would soon be called on to make regulations for other kinds of labour, as to which they would find it very difficult to draw a line.—Mr. HINDLEY was favourable to Lord Ashley's principle, and complained that he had been unfairly treated out of doors.—Mr. FERRAND said, that on the side of the working classes were truth and justice; on the side of the masters, falsehood and injustice. He challenged the masters to face the operatives at a meeting in the open air.

Mr. ROEBUCK desired to know to whom Mr. Ferrand had lately alluded, when he stated at a public meeting that a Minister of the Crown had used his influence to induce a public officer to put forth a false statement for the purpose of crushing a member of the house?—Mr. FERRAND answered, that the Minister was Sir J. Graham, that the member was himself, and that the public officer was Mr. Mott, the Poor-law Commissioner.—Mr. ROEBUCK again rose, and was proceeding to denounce the charge against Sir James Graham as scandalous, when Mr. Ferrand interrupted him.—Mr. FERRAND: "I don't know what the hon. and learned member means by using such language to me."—Mr. ROEBUCK: "My meaning is very plain."—Mr. FERRAND: "Then I tell him he shall not school me. I say that the man who would charge me unfounded in regard to any letter of this house, and as a gentleman." (Cheers, and loud cries of "Order").—The SPEAKER intimated to the hon. member that he was violating the order of debate.—Mr. FERRAND would look upon the speaker's authority as void (Hear, hear.") and considering the assertion was made deliberately, he was quite sure the hon. member, as well as himself, would feel that it was impossible the matter could rest there.—(Loud cheers).—And he hoped that the hon. gentleman was prepared to take the proper course to substantiate so grave a charge. (Cheering.)—Mr. HUME said it was reported also to have been stated by Mr. Ferrand, that Sir J. Graham had used his official influence with the chairman of the Nottingham Election Committee, to warp his decision respecting that election.—Mr. FERRAND answered that what he did say had been correctly represented in the report of The Times.—Mr. HOGG arose, and with a countenance flushed with indignation, gave vent to what fell from the hon. member when he was inveighing the country and assailing men with intolerable and unoperative calumnies—but when the hon. member stated in his place in Parliament, that (Mr. Hogg), a sworn officer of the crown, in the discharge of his public duty, had been influenced by a minister of the crown, grossly to abuse that public duty, to disregard his oath, and to give a verdict for a vile purpose against the weight of evidence, it was impossible for him any longer to treat it with indifference and contempt. And he called on the hon. member to substantiate his charge. No; he did not even want him to substantiate his charge, but he called on him to rise in his place, and say he leave the minds of that house a doubt, or the slightest suspicion, that he, in the discharge of his public duty, had been influenced by dishonourable motives, and if the hon. member could raise such a doubt or suspicion, then let him (Mr. Hogg be covered with merited obloquy, and depart from that house, in which he would no longer be worthy to sit. of whose deliberations he would no longer be worthy to partake. But if the hon. gentleman failed to satisfy the house that he had grounds for doubting his (Mr. Hogg's) honour and integrity, then let the hon. member himself be branded as the asserter of false, foul calumnies—let him stand convicted as such before the house and the country, and it would be then for himself to consider whether he was worthy any longer to sit in that assembly or to communicate with gentlemen.—Mr. FERRAND said, when he uttered the language which the hon. member had just brought before the house, he was alluding to the feeling of the house on that occasion, and he said that when the hon. member was higgling and haggling ——— Mr. HOGG: That was not the part I complained of, but your saying that the Government influenced me.—Mr. FERRAND: The hon. member, he believed, laboured under some mistake. When he used the language he did not say anything of the kind. Had the hon. members for Bath and Montrose given him notice of their intention to put these questions, he would have had the gentleman to say with him to refer for the absence of which did not give him a fair opportunity of defending himself. (Hear.) An attempt had been made to intimidate him that night, and that by men who did not dare to attempt it on the floor of the house, (a laugh from the League members.) Yes, they dared not. They were jealous of the unanimous feeling of affection shown to him by the working classes of the north (Oh, oh, oh!) men whom they had deserved for years (Oh, oh, oh!) men who had now cast them off. And did they think they would crush him? They could not do it. (Oh, oh.) He had a conscience void of offence, and he would abide by what he had uttered either out of the house or in it. (Hear, hear.) Sir J. Graham said: Well, they had the hon. gentleman tolerably pledged to one fact, let them have no higgling or haggling excuses for to-morrow. He would appeal to the generosity and fairness of both sides of the house, that it was expected that the hon. gentleman should come down to-morrow prepared with specific charges against him, not only as a minister of the Crown, but as a member of that house, whose honour the hon. gentleman had impeached in the most special manner he had impugned. He called on the hon. member, or rather on the house, to compel the hon. member to be specific in his allegations to prefer them in a tangible shape, and to compel the hon. gentleman to say anything before any tribunal—before any committee of that house—and let the hon. gentleman appoint his own committee, and he would not challenge the name of any honourable member to serve on it. (Loud cheers.)—Mr. FERRAND acceded to the challenge, and Mr. HOGG promised to come armed for his defence with documents.—Lord J. RUSSELL thought the precise words used by Mr. Ferrand were of little consequence: the question was, whether it had been in substance truly imputed to Mr. Hogg that he had betrayed his duty as chairman of an election committee, and whether it was in substance truly imputed to a minister of the crown that he had made a dishonest use of his official authority.

Sir R. PEEL, in reference to a report of his having said something about a conflict between Christianity and the Government on the factory bill, denied altogether that he had ever said anything of the kind; what he had said on the occasion when he was supposed to have uttered this passage was, that he believed the further reflection of members was likely to increase the numbers of those who would support the view of the Government.—The factory bill was then read a second time

Dr. NICHOLL moved the second reading of the ecclesiastical courts bill.—Sir GEORGE GREY objected to it, as leaving untouched the great evils of the ecclesiastical courts. and moved its second reading that day six months.—After some discussion the house divided, when there appeared—

Against the amendment	..	..	..	158
For it	..	..	..	59
Majority	..	..	..	99

Mr. DUNCOMBE then charged Sir R. Peel with inconsistency in bringing forward this measure. He could not, he said, understand how the right honourable baronet could reconcile the bill before the house with his assevveration that, "So help him God, it was an honest measure." In his (Mr. Duncombe's) opinion, to help him God it was one of the grossest jobs ever perpetrated.—Sir R. PEEL defended his consistency by asserting that he had given up last year's bill because it was inexpedient to encounter the opposition it would be sure to meet with; although he was convinced that it would be the better measure.—The bill was read a second time, and ordered for committal on Monday next.

The County Courts Bills were committed pro formâ to admit of amendments.

Mr. S. O'BRIEN obtained leave to bring in a bill to prohibit the holding of offices in churches.

The house adjourned at a quarter-past twelve.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—TUESDAY.

The Earl of Shaftesbury, in the absence of the Lord Chancellor, took his seat on the woolsack at five o'clock.

A number of petitions were presented against the union of the sees of St. Asaph and Bangor. A great many petitions were also presented from different parts of Ireland against the Dissenters' chapels bill; and a few were presented in its favour.

The Duke of WELLINGTON, in answer to a question from the Marquis of Clanricarde, said that Government would shortly receive a report from the Poor-law Commissioners of Ireland in respect to the subject of the poor-law there; and if any noble lords wished for inquiry, after that report was received, no opposition to such inquiry would be offered by the government; but he thought they ought to have the report in question before them first.

The Marquis of NORMANBY having put questions as to the reasons for which certain parties had been made Deputy Lieutenants in the case of the Queen's Henlon and others, tried at the last Assizes at Monaghan, Lord WHARNCLIFFE went into the cases of the parties in question seriatim, contending that the Crown Solicitor had not in any one instance exhibited a party on account of his being a Roman Catholic, but from very different reasons.—After some conversation the subject dropped, and their lordships adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—TUESDAY.

The Speaker took the chair at the usual hour.

Mr. T. Baring took the oath and his seat for Huntingdon.

In reply to a question from Dr. Bowring, Sir R. PEEL said that a treaty had been agreed upon between Prussia, on the part of the Zollverein, and the United States, by which the duties on timber imported into the latter, and on that imported from this and other countries. The treaty was, however, not yet ratified, and as the majority of the Senate in America were most probably opposed to it, the result could not be anticipated.

The house, which was very full, in anticipation of the expected explanations, had its impatience at last gratified by the SPEAKER calling on Mr. Ferrand, who, however, after a few words spoken by members in their places, in various, determined tone of voice, as if he were prepared for a long speech, excited long-continued shouts of laughter by the sudden abruptness of his conclusion, and his premature retirement from the house. It was long before the laughter and the derisive cheering subsided, breaking out from time to time on both sides, and defying all calls to order. Mr. Ferrand's speech was so ludicrously silly and short, that we give it here entire:—Mr. FERRAND said: "I have during this morning minutely examined into all the speeches which I made in the manufacturing districts during the Easter recess, and which have been published in the Times newspaper. I have paid particular attention to the leading articles of the Times, in which are certain extracts from speeches of mine, which were said to bear on the Right Honourable the Secretary of State for the Home Department, and the hon. member for Beverley. It is not my intention to retract one syllable which I used in those speeches, nor to extenuate or explain away a single sentence. When I made use of the language, I asserted the sacred prerogative of a free and independent member of the commons. Sir, the party spirit and unmanly bearing which was exhibited towards me last night, and which has burst forth at this instant, should remind those honourable gentlemen—and I am sure I shall be backed with the feeling of England—that this house is the last tribunal for them to appeal to." Here the hon. gentleman took up his hat, bowed to the Speaker as he passed, and left the house. His movement took all by surprise. He had made a long statement, [illegible] thought, at first, that [illegible] At length, after a moment or a few seconds, [illegible] joined in the general mirth, and resumed his seat. The laughter and confusion continued for a minute or two; and when it was about to subside, it seemed to be renewed by Mr. Ferrand rising from the seat which he had occupied on the bench below that on which Mr. Ferrand had sat, and going up and occupying the very place which the latter gentleman had just quitted, and then rising to address the house from it. The laughter, uproar, and confusion that followed, were indescribable. A contention afterwards arose between Mr. Roebuck and Mr. Borthwick, as to who should address the house. At last, the general call being in favour of Mr. Hogg, he rose and said he claimed, not the precedence, but the distinct allegation that he was actuated by impure motives. Those more conversant with the usages of the house might suggest what course should be adopted for ordering a hasty and unfounded charge, but at last upon him so foul an imputation. In a public journal of that morning (the Times), there was contained a base insinuation, as false as the other. It was, that while he was attending to his duties as chairman of the Nottingham election committee, he was after an official appointment. To this he gave a reiterated and emphatic denial, and sat down amid great cheering from all sides of the house.—Sir JAMES GRAHAM intimated that the manner in which Mr. Ferrand had fled—literally running away from both his accusations—disposed him to leave the matter where it was. But as the honour of every member, as of whom were regarded as "honourable," was in the hands of the house, it was for it to determine what course it should adopt.—Sir ROBERT PEEL said that it was a matter of choice for the house either to treat the matter with ridicule or seriously. If the latter, then he suggested that they should adjourn the debate, in order to afford time to look into precedents; for they might inconsiderately establish one which might hereafter be abused by the power of a majority. For himself, he thought the whole affair had no parallel since the day when the conjuror advertised that he would compress himself into a quart bottle, and at the appointed time suddenly disappeared.—Lord John RUSSELL said, that as Mr. Ferrand had neither withdrawn nor retracted his accusations, and had fled from their proof, it was important to determine what course should be adopted. As Mr. Hogg had claimed the protection of the house, he, for one, was quite prepared to vote for a resolution, declaring the charge against him to be false and calumnious. The case, as respected Sir James Graham, would differ in point of form, as he had not claimed the protection of the house. If they left the matter where it now was, they would be liable to the imputation of being indifferent to their character in the eyes of the country.—Lord STANLEY concurred in opinion that the debate should be adjourned, for there was no precedent to such a case. There was not an individual member who did not believe, not merely in the utter groundlessness of the charges, but that Mr. Ferrand knew, when he made them, that they were utterly incapable of proof. He came down with an air of boldness, as if he were about to substantiate his charges, and at the first breaking out of natural indignation, declared that he would not submit to the jurisdiction of the house, or retract his gross and libellous imputations. The matter was in the hands of the house, and did not depend on the fact that any one member had claimed its protection. Time should be taken for reflection as to the course to be pursued.—Mr. SPEAKER, who was appealed to, advised all discussion to be dropped, and that the course pursued in Mr. O'CONNELL's case should be adopted, which was to read the accusation, and Mr. Ferrand's admission of it, at the table of the house, and then proceed according to precedent. After a few words from Mr. BLACKSTONE and Sir R. H. INGLIS, the debate was adjourned until Wednesday.

Mr. NORTHWICK then rose to move an address to her Majesty, praying that her Majesty will be graciously pleased to afford to Parliament, in all matters ecclesiastical, the advice and assistance of the clergy in convocation assembled, according to the constitutional usage of the realm. While the hon. member was yet speaking, however, the house was counted, and there not being forty members present, immediately adjourned.

[The scene in the house at the moment of Mr. Ferrand's precipitate exit was one of the most tumultuous and exciting that has occurred within the walls of Parliament for many years. The hon. member for having thus left the house walked at a slow pace towards Parliament-street, with his hat slouched over his eyes, as if in a fit of very deep abstraction. When he reached the corner of Bridge-street, he appeared to recognise an old pensioner on his bounty—the sweeper, or, in more polite language, the "incumbent" of the crossing—to whom he gave the usual douceur and hurriedly passed on.]

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—WEDNESDAY.

Sir J. GRAHAM introduced the case of privilege, by moving that the passages in the speeches of Mr. Ferrand, containing the two charges against the House of Commons, of which Mr. Hogg should be read at the table. This having been done,—The SPEAKER inquired if the member for Knaresborough was in his place? No answer having been returned, Sir R. PEEL rose, to tender his respectful advice to the house, as to the course which should be adopted. He had referred to the three cases in recent times, analogous to the present one—that of the complaint of Lord Maidstone against Mr. O'Connell, of Mr. Sheil against Mr. Rill, in the case of "Who's the traitor?" and that of Mr. Blackstone, who, when he was chairman of an election committee, was accused of corruption. The result of his consideration was, that the house should proceed with a strict adherence to all established precedents. Mr. Ferrand had admitted the correctness of the report of his speeches containing the charges; but strict justice required that no advantage should be taken of these admissions. He would grant him the opportunity of unreservedly acknowledging or denying the accuracy of his reported charges; and if he admitted their accuracy, to allow him the privilege of attempting their proof before a select committee. He would, therefore, move that the complaint be taken into consideration on Friday next; and if that were affirmed, to follow it with another—that Mr. Ferrand be required to attend in his place on that occasion. Lord JOHN RUSSELL approved of the course.—Mr. FERRAND then made a statement in his own behalf against it. The accuracy of the reports was questionable, though he admitted Mr. Ferrand was unfortunate in not having a better command of his tongue.—Mr. T. DUNCOMBE did not approve of the proposed method of procedure. Why not appoint a committee at once? Had he been placed in Mr. Ferrand's position, he would have demurred to the right of any member to question him for his private conduct, and would have offered him any satisfaction, in the house or out of it. But if Mr. Ferrand could not sustain his accusations, the more manly course would have been to acknowledge his error.—Mr. DISRAELI objected to all establishing a precedent

Coroners Bill, which stood for further consideration; but Mr. HUME perfinaciously opposed a certain proposed addition of "three-pence" per mile, which has already been a matter of much debate, and the thin state of the house the managers of the bill were compelled to postpone its further consideration.

Mr. FRENCH next rose, in a house of about twenty members, to call attention to the Dublin jury lists, but the thread of his discourse was nipped in the fatal counting of the house, which, by previous agreement, adjourned till Friday.

The house at its rising adjourned over until Friday.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—FRIDAY.

The Lord Chancellor took his seat on the woolsack at five o'clock.

The Dissenters' chapels bill was read a second time pro forma, and ordered to be committed on that day week.

Lord BROUGHAM presented a petition from the venerable Thomas Clarkson, with regard to slave labour as connected with the growth of sugar, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Lord NORTHAM moved the second reading of the Landlord and Tenants Compensation Bill.—Lord BEAUMONT moved that the bill be read a second time that day six months. -Lord REDESDALE seconded the amendment.—The house divided, when there appeared—

For the Second Reading	..	..	..	27
For the Amendment	..	..	..	32
Majority	..	..	..	5

Their lordships then adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—FRIDAY.

The Speaker having taken the chair, a new writ was ordered for the borough of Horsham.

On the order of the day that the report of the committee upon the Leeds and Bradford Railway Bill be further considered, Mr. HARDY moved the appointment of the bill, which, after some discussion, was carried by a majority of 155 to 56.

On the motion of Mr. P. HOWARD, the Newquay Harbour and Railway Bill was read a third time and passed.

On the motion of Sir H. DOUGLAS, the Lords' amendments to the Liverpool Gas Bill were agreed to.

Mr. MACAULAY said he wished to put a question to the right hon. baronet at the head of her Majesty's Government. He wished to ask him whether it was true, as had been reported, that her Majesty's Government had recalled Lord Ellenborough from the Government of India.?—Sir R. PEEL said —In answer to the question which has been put to me by the right hon. gentleman, I beg to state that on Wednesday last her Majesty's Government received a communication from the Court of Directors, that they had exercised the power which the law gives them, to recall, at their will and pleasure, the Governor-General of India. (Loud cheers from the Opposition benches.)—Mr. MACAULAY said, that under those circumstances, he need scarcely say, that it was not his intention to bring forward on Tuesday week the motion of which he had given notice respecting the late events in that country. He would reserve the right of bringing that subject under the notice of the house hereafter, but as the administration of Lord Ellenborough had terminated, he could not state the public grounds of censure which he exposed to on the smallest risk, from the postponement of the discussion; and it would be more satisfactory to his own feelings, and it would clearly be more agreeable to justice, that no charge should be made against that noble lord, until he was able to attend in the other house to vindicate his character. (Cheers from both sides).

The house at this period of the evening was exceedingly crowded, owing, no doubt, to the great anxiety which prevailed to know the issue of Mr. Ferrand's customary in refusing to make any concession or apology with regard to the charges brought by him against Sir James Graham and Mr. Hogg. The gentlemanly conduct of the evening was opened by Mr. ROEBUCK, who complained of personal hostilities of the evening was opened by Mr. ROEBUCK, who complained of personal hostilities of the evening was opened by Mr. ROEBUCK, who complained of Mr. Smythe, the honourable member for Canterbury, having sent him a challenge for some words which he had spoken in the early part of the evening, returning on the hon. member who had called him a rebel to his Queen and the friend of Papineau. The letter was then handed in and read by the clerk at the table.

"Travellers' Club,—April, 1844.

Sir, I cannot determine from the newspaper report, of your speech in the House of Commons last night, nor from what I understood when I heard it, whether you are personally on or not to any line to which I addressed my observations. If so, I beg to refer you to a letter which I addressed to my constituents, dated — July, 1843, in which was the passage

"That I never asked favour of Sir Robert Peel or of his Government, I would not have been actuated by any disappointment of obligation in voting against them." Now I call upon you to state that you did not mean to apply those words to me; and if you will do either to retract them or to refer to a friend with whom my friend, Captain Garrett, may communicate. (Signed)

Mr. ROEBUCK said that the letter had been handed to him by Captain Garrett, to whom he gave answer that Mr. Smythe should hear from him, but only in the House of Commons.—Mr SMYTHE said the hon. and learned member had dealt true to his usual practice, had taken one hon. member by surprise, because the answer given to him (Mr. Smythe) by the gentleman he had sent to the hon and learned member for Bath was not that which the hon. and learned member for Bath had been reported to the house. The answer given by the hon. and learned member for Bath to the gentleman sent to him was this "He shall hear of this." His (Mr. Smythe's) friend had replied that he must have "a definite answer," to which the hon. and learned member for Bath had rejoined, "He would send an answer." From that hour he (Mr. Smythe) had been expecting an answer. When he understood that the hon. and learned member had thus taken by surprise the matter before the house, he expected that he would have done it in a speech somewhat similar to those he was in the habit of making—a speech full of those aspers one he was in the habit of throwing out. He had always honourable and honest motives done so, it only remained for him most humbly and respectfully to apologise to the house, if he had done anything which involved a breach of its order and privileges. (Cheers.) Sir R. PEEL said, according to the course usually taken in such cases, it would be necessary that both hon. gentlemen should give an assurance, which they would have no difficulty in giving, that this matter should not go further. Mr. ROEBUCK objected to comply with this, because this would presuppose that he intended to pursue that course. (Laughter.)—Sir R. PEEL said, that assurance clearly extended the hon. and learned gentleman from any suspicion of wishing to do so. (Hear, hear.)—Mr. ROEBUCK: It now rests entirely for me to discharge my duty by calling on Mr. Smythe to give the house his assurance that he will not take any hostile proceedings.—Mr. SMYTHE: The only thing I can fairly assure the hon. and learned member chooses to bring the matter before the house, and then says I am not one to bring matters to extremities, thereby insinuating that I am the person (laughter), and throwing the odium of the position on me, it is perfectly absurd, because you must remember the position in which the hon. gentleman places me. If the hon. and Learned Gentleman is willing to state, that he has taken the initiative in this matter, because he is the most difficult man in the world to deal with (laughter, and cries of Order, order)—because he has engaged in some half dozen "affairs of the kind.—(Loud cries of Order, order Chair, chair.)—The SPEAKER: The Hon. Gentleman must see that his conduct was not respectful to the House.

He had been asked not to engage in hostile proceedings; and he (the Speaker) now requested that he would answer that call.—Mr. SMYTHE: Then I will do so in one word. As it is impossible to determine whether the Hon. and Learned Gentleman is only here in this House as a Member of Parliament, I beg in the most full and unreserved manner to apologise for any breach of forms or of the House of which I may have been guilty. I have no more to say, excepting that this matter will not go further.

On the motion of Sir R. PEEL, the order of the day for proceeding with the matter of the complaint of the hon. and learned gentleman the member for Beverley, and the right hon. gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department, was read.—The SPEAKER: The William Busfield Ferrand, Esq. in his place?—Mr. Ferrand rose and bowed.—The clerk at the table then read the report of Mr. Ferrand's speech.—Mr. FERRAND then rose and apologised to the house for having taken up so much of its time, by his having inadvertently answered Mr. Roebuck's question on a former evening instead of treating it as it deserved, and as had been suggested by the hon. member for Finsbury. He then gave a brief history of the proceedings from the commencement, and having again admitted that the report of the speech made by him at Leeds, which appeared in the Times newspaper, was correct, he thus concluded—"I am given to understand that I am now proceeding on my place this evening to plead guilty to the charge, when the honourable and learned gentleman has made against me, that I shall receive a free pardon at his hands—that if I do not plead guilty the house will then proceed to pass sentence on me without even examining any evidence. (Cries of "No, no!")—that it will proceed to pass sentence on me without any evidence as to the construction to be put upon my words. I hope I shall be allowed to say my word as to the conduct hitherto observed by this self-constituted Court of Honour. Mr. Speaker—No man, Sir, ever sat in that chair, who conducted himself with more strict impartiality, more gentlemanly demeanour, or more graceful bearing than yourself. (Cheers.) But, Sir, in this new office as judge of this self-constituted Court of Honour, you yourself have found the greatest difficulty in acting as an impartial judge. Sir, the other evening, when that common informer applied to me—(Loud cries of 'order, order.') I retract the words, but I will never retract the sentiment. (Partial cheering.) Sir, when that public accuser—(Interruption)—it is a parliamentary phrase, and it is ungenerous to attempt to interrupt me. Sir, when that public accuser applied to me the epithet of falsehood the other evening, I der ared that the language was ungentlemanly. You called me to order. Sir, when one of the witnesses in this prosecution read his evidence against me he supported it by engrafting on that evidence a leading article in the Times newspaper. (Hear, hear). Sir, the leading men of both political parties in this house attacked me in violent language. Nay, one of them in language unparalleled, charged me with a crime, Sir, of which he himself was guilty. Is he a fit judge to sit here? I admit that a more generous or generous-hearted man never trod the soil of Britain (the hon. gent. alluded to Lord Stanley), but under the excitement of the moment he uttered expressions which were quite unjustifiable. (Hear, hear). Sir, the shouts of revenge which issued from the jury were also within your hearing; and let the house recollect that the Prime Minister of England, when I had scarcely left these walls, declared in this house, that by having done so I had deprived it of gratifying itself with a great deal of amusement. (Hear, hear, and cheers.) Sir, as a member of this house, I protest against these proceedings. In the name of the people of England—(ironical cheers) I deny your right to try me on this charge—in the name of the people of England I pronounce this self-constituted Court of Honour to be an illegal and unconstitutional court; and, Sir, in the name of the people of England, I refuse to plead at its bar." (Cries of "Hear, hear," and partial cheering.) Sir JAMES GRAHAM followed, and gave a distinct and positive denial to all the charges made against him by Mr. Ferrand.—Mr. JAMES WORTLEY endeavoured, but in vain, to put a less offensive construction on the charges than that given to them. Sir ROBERT PEEL then rose for the purpose of advising the house the course which it ought to pursue under the circumstances. He asked whether Mr. Ferrand had anything more to add to the observations which he had already made.—Mr. FERRAND said, "Nothing more in addition to what I have." The SPEAKER said the usual course for hon. gentlemen to pursue under such circumstances was to withdraw.—Mr. Ferrand then walked out of the house, followed by Sir James Graham and Mr. Hogg. (Great laughter was excited by Mr. F. Borthwick eagerly rushing out, as if to overtake Mr. Ferrand.)—Sir R. PEEL then continued his observations; and, after dwelling at considerable length on the nature of the charges and the course adopted by the accuser, he concluded by proposing a resolution to the effect "that the charges were unfounded and calumnious." He said he thought this was sufficiently pointed towards Mr. Ferrand, without making the resolution personal. Mr. FRENCH proposed an amendment, to the effect that, after the charges made by Lord Stanley against the late Ministers, when he called them "thimblerigers," and the accusation brought against Mr. Colden by the Premier, when he said that the hon. gent. shirted assassination, it was inexpedient to take any further step in the matter. There was no seconder, however, and it consequently fell to the ground.—Sir R. PEEL's resolution was then put and carried unanimously.

The house then went into committee on the Factories Bill, after an ineffectual attempt on the part of Mr. T. Duncombe to have it referred to a select committee up-stairs.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

VICE CHANCELLOR'S COURT.

(Before Vice-Chancellor Wigram.)

Saturday, April 20.

This case came before the Court on Wednesday. By the bill a title was claimed to certain estates in the county of Kent, of considerable value, which were alleged to have been devised to one Frederick Broadnax by will, and the plaintiff, under whom the defendant derived his title was appointed guardian to the devisee, and the latter was stated to be an infant. It was alleged in the bill that the guardian caused the deeds to be kept in a chest, to which one key only was erected in the park, where he remained, in total ignorance of his title to the estate; that he afterwards lived in a neighbouring village, and that small sums were given to him from time to time by the party who had been appointed his guardian, his right to the property in question, being still concealed from him. It was further alleged that Thomas Broadnax May lived to the age of ninety-nine, and that he died in 1824, without having had a right to claim the estate by a civil action, or a criminal prosecution for an assault. The defendant, however, did not proceed in the courts of common law, but libelled the plaintiff in the Consistorial Court of the Bishop of Bangor, where a decree was declared guilty, and admonished and ordered to pay the costs. A proceeding was taken to carry the sentence into effect, and the plaintiff then applied to the court for a prohibition. The question now came before the court for the opinion of the court was, whether a sentence of an ecclesiastical court could be supported and enforced, when on the face of that sentence it was apparent that the proceeding on which the sentence was founded related to matters not simply of ecclesiastical, but of common law cognizance.—Mr. Bovill was heard in support of the demurrer, and Mr. V. Williams on behalf of the plaintiff.—Lord Denman: The first part of the sentence relates to a matter for which the plaintiff, Daniels, was convicted on an action of common law. If, therefore, a prohibition had been applied for in an early stage of the proceedings in the ecclesiastical court, there is no doubt it would have been granted. The question now is, whether the court can, after the sentence has been in operation as to a matter which is clearly not within the jurisdiction of the ecclesiastical courts, will render the jurisdiction effective. I think that it will not, and that the prohibition must be granted. The question then, as to the course, whether this court will interfere when it appears that part of the subject matter of the suit was within the jurisdiction of the ecclesiastical courts, it is necessary to limit the assumption of authority by the courts of common jurisdiction, for otherwise they would, by merely including in suits matters clearly within their jurisdiction, draw within the line of its operation things which by law are not within their jurisdiction. Here the ecclesiastical court proceeded to pronounce a sentence which not properly subject to its cognisance, and which appears on the face of the sentence itself not to be within its jurisdiction. This cannot be permitted, and the prohibition must go. The other judges concurred. Judgment for the plaintiff in prohibition.

POLICE.

MARYLEBONE.—On Tuesday George Arnold Huggins was placed at the bar before Mr. Rawlinson, charged with having stolen some saws and other carpenters' tools, the property of Mr. John Baker, of George-yard, Hatton-wall, Hatton-garden.—The prisoner was then given into the custody of Sarah Ann, who was coming out of an unfinished house in Exeter-street, Kentish-town, having in his possession the articles above alluded to, and as he gave an unsatisfactory account respecting them, therefore, was conveyed to the station-house. The prisoner was locked up on the charge at the Kentish-town station, and while there he cut his throat with a knife, which he had no doubt secreted beneath some bandages which he had about him, which fortunately were of such a description as to prevent any fatal consequences. He was conveyed to the University College Hospital, being at the time in a very alarming condition, and from that institution he was now, being sufficiently recovered to be removed, brought to this court in a cab.—Mr. Rawlinson committed the prisoner, but his duty to send you for trial upon the charge brought against you; you need not say anything here unless you think proper.—Prisoner: I was in the deepest distress, brought to apply to a pawnbroker, and was at the point sent a man of coffin, with pieces of brick and rubbish at the bottom of it. I went on Thursday night with the intention of committing a robbery, or putting an end to myself.—Mr. Rawlinson: I have heard that since you have been in the hospital your mind has undergone a change, and that you have now no thoughts of laying violent hands on yourself again.—Prisoner: I have not, Sir.—Mr. Rawlinson: Then I shall commit you for trial, and congratulate that he believed the prisoner's statement of his distress true in every particular. He had himself, on Friday last, visited the apartment occupied by the prisoner, and found nothing, kindly supplied him with some little comforts.—Mr Rawlinson: Has she had any other relief?—Inspector Aggs: Yes, Sir, one shilling, as she stated to me, from the Holborn Union.—Mr. Rawlinson remarked that the way in which the inquiries had been made highly creditable to him, and expressed a hope that he would still keep a watchful eye upon the case, with the view of benefiting the wretched family.—Mr. Aggs promised that he would attend to the suggestion of the worthy magistrate, and concluded by stating that the unfortunate man and his wife bore a most excellent character

UNION-HALL. Mr. William Leser was brought up, charged with committing an assault of rather an extraordinary character. The wife, a delicate-looking female.—The complainant stated that on the preceding day, having had some words with the defendant, he snatched up a bamboo cane, as thick as one of her fingers, and began to flourish it over his head, when the defendant caught the cane and broke it in half. He then picked up one of the broken pieces, and renewed the attack upon her, until she was compelled to run out, and take refuge in a neighbour's house, where she added that he pursued her and struck her a severe blow on the eye and running up to him (defendant), began to belabour him about the head and face, and he really believed she would have torn out his eyes, had he not resisted her violence, and that all he did was to give her two smart cuts with the cane across her shoulders, which had the effect of restraining her for the time. He added, that the blows were not given with such force as to be visible.—The wife corroborated the latter assertion, and offered to exhibit her marks privately to the worthy magistrate, in order to bear out the truth of her statement. She also complained that the defendant on a former occasion had treated her with great violence, and that she wished to be separated from him from that moment. The magistrate said that he had not the power of doing so, but advised the parties to make up the quarrel, for the defendant to make the amende honorable to his wife, and promise never again to use her with harshness.—The complainant, however, rejected any compromise with her husband, saying, that he degraded her in the eyes of her family and servants, and that she should not live with him.—The defendant was ultimately held to bail to keep the peace, and he at the same time agreed to give his wife a separate maintenance.

Edwin Willis, a midshipman, son of Mr. Willis, surgeon, of Kennington, was charged with threatening the life of his father, and seeing otherwise with great violence. The complainant stated that his son had been from sea for nine months, and during that period he lived at home with his family; that he led a very irregular life, stopping out all hours of the night, returning home intoxicated very often, and carrying pistols about him, and threatening to blow out the brains of some of his family. The defendant also claimed his right of remaining in the house as long as he liked, refused to apply himself to any profession or business to obtain his own livelihood, and, in fact, led a most dissolute life.—Defendant exclaimed, that instead of being treated as a gentleman in his own father's house, he was locked down and frowned upon by the whole family —that he performed the most degrading offices at home; at one time he was his father's groom, another time his collector of rents, another time his surgical assistant, and, for all this, he got nothing but his food.—Mr. Traill: Having all these qualifications, which it appears by your own account you have performed, how is it that you don't leave your father's house and get your own living? —Complainant: He knows I am bound to maintain my family decently. I have wish that your worship will inform him whether such is the law or not.—Mr. Traill said that the complainant was not bound to support his son in idleness, and as the defendant had used threats of violence he should find bail.

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

ROBBERY OF BONDS, BANK-NOTES, &c.—On Sunday evening, between the hours of 7 and 8, the dwelling-house of Mr. James Dearlove, No. 2, Bartholomew-terrace, Bethnal-green, was entered by means of skeleton keys, and plundered of property to the amount of £10,000. It appeared that Mr. Dearlove, who formerly was a brewer, and latterly has been in the habit of doing some business on the Stock Exchange, had left his house in the course of the evening, and shortly after one o'clock a lady, who is his housekeeper and niece, went to chapel, leaving everything safe, and locking the door after her, and on her return home she found the front door locked as she had left it, and so still had the thieves executed their work that nothing occurred for nearly two hours after to awaken the slightest suspicion that any robbery had been committed. The first thing that led to the discovery of the robbery was a search for the plate, which had been used in the absence of the day, and which the housekeeper was in the habit of taking to her bed-room with her every night, and which could not be found. This fact being communicated to Mr. Dearlove, he hastened upstairs to a cupboard, to which he kept his cashbox, and finding it locked, thought all was safe. On unlocking it, however, he discovered that the cashbox, with its valuable contents, was gone, as well as his gold watch and appendages, and various other property. Amongst the property carried away were colonial and other bonds for £3000, bills of exchange for nearly £4000, two Bank of England notes for £100 each, three Bank of England notes of £50 each, and two of £5 each, together with cases for valuable property.

FATAL ACCIDENT.—On Monday morning, Mr. Standon, Ivery-stable keeper, expired in Charing-cross Hospital, under the following circumstances:—On Friday he was driving a gig in Regent-street, accompanied by a friend, when the horse took fright and started off at the top of his speed. His friend jumped out, and escaped with a few slight bruises, but Mr. Standon was thrown out with considerable violence, when near the Duke of York's column, and, pitching upon his head, sustained a severe fracture of the skull. The gig was shattered to atoms by coming in contact with the lamp-post.

FIRE ON SHIP AND LOSS OF LIFE.—On Monday forenoon an inquiry was gone into before Mr. Baker, the coroner, at the King's Arms, Narrow-street, Limehouse, respecting the death of John Tummins, aged 22, who lost his life on a fire that occurred early that morning on board the Perseverance sloop, of Goole, whilst lying in the Regent Canal Dock, Ratcliffe. On knocking in the bulk head, and tearing away a slight boarding, the deceased was discovered lying on the cabin floor, dreadfully burnt and quite dead. He appeared to have been in bed, as he had a part of his night-clothing on. The fire in the forecastle had been put out at 7 o'clock on the previous evening, and none was found after the alarm of the outbreak. It appeared, that the flames were first discovered by the night constable on duty in the dock, by whose promptitude much valuable property was saved, as the sloop was surrounded with laden brigs and schooners; and, owing to the early alarm, they were hauled away from the burning vessel before any damage could befal them. Verdict, "Accidental death."

DISTRESSING SUICIDE OF A YOUNG LADY.—On Tuesday morning Miss Eliza Lavender, a lady living with her mother and sisters in Plunder's-row, Commercial-road East, committed suicide It seems that until within the last three days she had conducted herself with that strict propriety befitting the respectability of her station, but that a change was perceptible to her friends, and she seemed to abandon herself to despair. Between eight and nine o'clock she put on an elegant velvet dress, and, proceeding from her room to the attic, got out on the roof, and flung herself from the parapet to the pavement. She fell on the left side of her head, and was instantly taken up by Serjeant Eves, H 14, and constable Foye, H 26, who were close to the spot, when she was found to be a corpse.

THE LATE FATAL ACCIDENT AT THE DOVER RAILWAY TERMINUS. John Matthews, aged 42, another of the sufferers, expired at Guy's Hospital, on Monday afternoon at 5 o'clock. The injuries he received were principally on the head; inflammation having ensued, his case baffled all medical skill.

A DRACULOUS ESCAPE.—On Tuesday morning, between four and five o'clock, as police-constable G 59, was proceeding on his beat in Richmond-street, St. James's, his attention was arrested by the violent raising of the second-floor window at the house No. 3, in that street, and at the same moment a woman made her appearance, who, after uttering a faint shriek, precipitated herself into the area beneath. The constable immediately raised an alarm, and the poor woman, who, on being raised was apparently dead or dying, was conveyed to Charing-cross Hospital, where she was promptly attended by Mr. Charles Goulding, one of the house-surgeons, who, upon examination of her person, discovered that, notwithstanding the frightful leap she had made, she had not sustained the fracture of a single bone. She had, however, received severe bruises, and it will be some days ere she will be enabled to resume her domestic duties. She is a respectable young married woman, of considerable personal attractions, and has a very interesting offspring. The cause of her desperate attempt at self-destruction is stated to have proceeded from a quarrel she had lately had with her husband, from whom she is separated. Her escape from instant death is truly marvellous, as in her descent she passed within an inch of the iron railing of the area.

FIRE IN LIVERPOOL-BUILDINGS, BISHOPSGATE-STREET.—Shortly before one o'clock on Wednesday morning an alarming fire broke out upon the premises in the occupation of Mr. T. Kelly, coal, wood, &c. dealer, Liverpool-buildings, Bishopsgate street. The inmates had retired to rest some time before the outbreak, and on the first alarm a strong light above the entrance to the coal-yard. An alarm was instantly raised, and the engines from Jeffery-square and other stations of the brigade being in attendance, the flames were happily confined to the ground floor, in which the fire appeared to have originated.

MELANCHOLY DEATH.—Mr. Edmund T. Clark, a student at the Charing-cross Hospital, has lost his life from the effects of an accidental puncture in one of his fingers while dissecting the body of a deceased person, about four weeks since. The wound being slight, Mr. Clark took little notice of it at the time, but in a few days alarming symptoms were presented, inflammation rapidly increased, and notwithstanding every effort of the medical skill of the institution, he gradually sunk, and, finally, death terminated his sufferings. The deceased was 22 years of age.

DEATH FROM A TOBACCO MACHINE. On Tuesday, an inquest was held at the Grange Inn, Carey-street, Lincoln's Inn-fields, before Mr. Higgs, on the body of Mr. Benjamin Edgington, aged 27, an engineer employed in the tobacco-warehouse of Messrs. Lambert, Alexander, and Co. On Friday afternoon last, a machine, recently constructed for the purpose of cutting tobacco-stalks, was, for the second time, set to work upon Messrs. Lambert's premises, and one of the persons being employed to feed it, and because poor upon the wheel, deceased endeavoured to adjust it with a stick, but instead of pushing the strap as he intended, the end of the stick was caught by one of the spokes of the wheel, and struck deceased upon the head, which was thereby severely cut. He was instantly speechless and insensible by the injury, and was conveyed to King's College Hospital; but although he once rallied, he gradually sunk, and died on Monday last.—Verdict, "Accidental death."

LAMENTABLE SUICIDE.—A few days ago, Mr. Joseph Simpson Goodridge, a young gentleman residing with his mother, at Peckham, was unfortunately attacked with a fit of epilepsy, upon leaving which the friend of Goodridge observed that a second attack of the complaint generally carried off the patient, and at the same time recommended Mr. Goodridge to be most cautious, otherwise that would be his fate. Mr. Goodridge, on returning home, expressed great dread of a second attack, and it appeared, while labouring under a great deal of nervous excitement, he retired, unknown to the family, to the rear of the premises, and in a shed where lumber was kept he put a period to his existence, and was found soon afterwards hanging by the neck from one of the beams. Medical assistance was procured, but all attempts to produce resuscitation were unavailing.

DEPERATE SUICIDE OF A FRENCH CAPTAIN.—On Wednesday morning, the French brig St. Jean, from Gravelines, arrived at Fenning's wharf, having on board the body of the captain, Victor Lavalle, who hung himself at Halfway Reach. The vessel arrived at Gravesend on Tuesday afternoon, at one o'clock, loaded with eggs. The captain, who was well known to the tide-waiter, for upwards of twenty years, appeared in low spirits while the vessel was making up the river, and on coming to he went into his cabin, and the crew supposed he was to rest. About half an hour after, Cairnes, one of the tide-waiters, went to the companion-way leading to the cabin, and attempted to get his bed down. Finding it difficult to open the door, he looked in, and discovered the deceased hanging by his neck by a silk handkerchief to an iron catch, used in fastening the companion-way. He was cut down, and found to be quite dead. Deceased was forty-five years of age, and has left a wife and large family at Gravelines. He was part owner of the vessel and cargo. The body was removed to St. Olave's workhouse, previous to inquest.

DEATH FROM DROWNING.—On Wednesday an inquest was held before Mr. Carter, Coroner for Surrey, at the Rose, Russell-street, Bermondsey, on the body of William Griffiths, aged 47, mate of the schooner Young Eagle, of Milford Haven. On Monday morning last, about half-past five, the deceased was in the act of fastening the ship's boat to the stern of the vessel, when he accidentally fell overboard, and, although seen struggling in the water, sank before assistance reached him. Mr. Monk, of the Rose and Crown, Horsleydown-stairs, at whose house the drags belonging to the Royal Humane Society are kept, used every exertion to recover the body, but, unfortunately, did not succeed until nearly eleven o'clock in the forenoon. Mr. Monk has, on several occasions, distinguished himself in saving persons who have accidentally fallen overboard. The jury, after a short consultation, returned a verdict of "Accidentally Drowned."

HER MAJESTY'S BIRTHDAY DRAWING-ROOM.

HER MAJESTY'S BIRTH-DAY.

Thursday being appointed for the celebration of her Majesty's birth, the morning was ushered in with merry peals from the bells of the different metropolitan churches, and other loyal demonstrations of attachment to the Sovereign.

The usual inspection of the different regiments of Foot Guards took place at ten o'clock, on the parade in St. James's Park; and at one o'clock the Park and Tower guns fired a Royal salute. In the evening there was a grand illumination at the theatres, public buildings, clubs, and houses of the Royal tradesmen.

THE DRAWING ROOM.

Her Majesty held a Drawing Room at St. James's Palace in commemoration of the day, which was most brilliantly attended. The different branches of the Royal Family, the Cabinet Ministers, Great Officers of State, and the Household, the Foreign Ambassadors and Ministers, and those having the privilege of the entrée, arrived in quick succession shortly after one o'clock, at which time the Park presented a most animated spectacle, many thousands of her Majesty's loyal subjects having availed themselves of the delightful state of the weather, to witness this grand and imposing spectacle.

Their Majesties the King and Queen of the Belgians arrived in state, escorted by the Life Guards, and were received by the Queen's Vice-Chamberlain (Lord Ernest Bruce), who conducted these illustrious personages to the Royal closet.

Previous to the Drawing Room, the Archbishops and Bishops were introduced to the Queen in the Royal closet, and presented an address of congratulation on the return of her Majesty's birthday. The Archbishop of Canterbury delivered the address, to which her Majesty was pleased to return a most gracious answer. The Lord Chancellor came in state, attended by his Secretary, Purse-bearer, and Mace-bearer; and the other Equity Judges also wore their state robes.

THE TAPESTRY CHAMBER, ST. JAMES'S PALACE.

Shortly before two o clock, her Majesty and Prince Albert, accompanied by the ladies and gentlemen in attendance on the court, and escorted by a detachment of the Royal Horse Guards, left Buckingham Palace and proceeded to St. James's. On the line of road her Majesty and her illustrious consort were loudly cheered by the assembled thousands, and on the Royal cortège arriving at the Palace, the bands of the different regiments of Guards played the National Anthem. Her Majesty appeared in excellent health and spirits.

The Lord Chief Justice of the Queen's Bench, the Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, and the Chief Baron of the Exchequer, wore their distinguishing collars of office. The right honourable the Speaker also came in state.

Being "a collar day," all the members of the diplomatic, ministerial, and household corps appeared in their full-dress costumes; and the members of the various orders of knighthood wore their insignia, in most instances brilliantly set in diamonds. The dresses of the ladies were remarkable for elegance and magnificence; brilliants and diamonds were the prevailing head-dress, with flowing ostrich feathers and lappets.

The company began to arrive at one o'clock, and before half-past two Queen Anne's room and the Presence Chamber were filled, extending down the grand staircase. The attendance of the entrée company was also extremely numerous.

A guard of honour of the Life Guards, with their band, was stationed in the quadrangle facing Marlborough House; and a guard of honour was likewise placed in the open space opposite St. James's-street. The Foot Guards, with their band, were in the Flag-court.

The foreign corps diplomatique were first introduced, after which the general company was admitted. Being the birthday drawing-room, no presentations were allowed, except in the foreign diplomatic circles, and they have the entrée of the company, as they pass to the drawing-room.

PARLIAMENTARY PORTRAITS.—Nos. XIV.—XV.

MR. HOGG.

In the present day, to stand out in bold relief in the crowded picture of public life, is by no means easy of attainment; but there are some men who can readily not only positively acquire, if not what is called fame, at least that which is akin to it—notoriety; and to such an extent, too, that, like bodies charged with electricity, they impart a portion of it to those who happen, from whatever circumstances, to be brought in contact with them. Such is the honourable member for Knaresborough; and true to the analogy, he has—apparently unconsciously—imparted a portion of that prestige which appertains to his own name to that of the honourable member for Beverley—the subject of the present notice. Some casual observations out of doors from Mr. Ferrand, on the conduct of Mr. Hogg in his capacity of Chairman of an Election Committee, have been sufficient to furnish a theme for much discussion in the Legislature during the week just passed, and also to make the name of Mr. Hogg familiar as household words to many who before had never perhaps heard his name pronounced. However, he is a man who is by no means an incognita, and whose character and influence have great weight with men of station and ability of all parties. On matters connected with the Anglo Indian empire he is looked upon as a high authority, not only in the House of Commons, but also in that convocation of Prince-merchants, who, from their court in Leadenhall-street, dictate laws to one hundred and twenty millions of souls in the sunny land of India. Mr. Hogg is a member of the legal profession; and shortly after being called to the bar, he turned his attention to settling in India. He chose Calcutta as the theatre of his exertions, and practised in the courts of law there for several years with great success; for some time previous to his return home he filled the office of Registrar in the Supreme Court of Calcutta.

Mr. Hogg is a Conservative in politics, and represents the town of Beverley in Parliament. In personal appearance he is somewhat above the middle stature—stout, robust, and healthy-looking—and, though considerably advanced in years, exhibits the vigour of a much younger man. When he addresses the house, his language, though not eloquent, yet almost always embodies such sound conceptions, just views, and great common sense, that he invariably commands the respectful attention of his hearers. He shows himself a shrewd observer of men and events as they pass before him; and though at times not quite so impressive as many speakers of his own stamp, yet his suggestions are very generally found worthy, if not of immediate adoption, at least of careful consideration. His denial on Tuesday evening last of Mr. Ferrand's charges against him, was a fervid burst of honest indignation, uttered in an able and masterly style.

LORD JOHN MANNERS.

Among the few who have interposed between Mr. Ferrand and the House of Commons, in the quarrel which has furnished the Clubs with conversation for a whole week, is Lord John Manners, an amiable and talented nobleman, who, if not the "head" of the "Young England" section, occupies a very prominent position among them. On Wednesday evening he spoke on the subject briefly, but to the purpose; seeming to think that the member for Knaresborough had hardly had fair play. He said he did not consider the words which were applied to Mr. Hogg, as Chairman of the Nottingham Election Committee, contained anything more than an inference. "Therefore," he continued, "I contend that the charge falls to the ground as far as the honourable member for Beverley is concerned. As far as the right honourable gentleman (Sir J. Graham) is concerned, he, being the best judge of the matter, declared in the first instance, that he wished the whole thing to rest where it was. Now, I maintain that, after such a declaration as that, we are fully justified—this house is fully justified—in allowing the matter to rest in its present position. You have had the subject before you for two nights. You have had the debate all one way. It commenced without any announcement; it has been marked throughout with a very bad party spirit, and I am prepared to say that it is not for the honourable member for Bath, whenever he chooses, to call upon the house to prosecute private or public quarrels between honourable members of this house."

He moved the "previous question" as an amendment on the resolution before the house, which would have got rid of the matter altogether, but was induced to withdraw it by the declarations of Mr. Hogg and Sir James Graham, that if Mr. Ferrand would retract his charge, and express his regret for having made it, they would think no more or the subject. Lord John James Robert Manners is the son of the Duke of Rutland; he is but twenty-five years of age, but has already distinguished himself both in literature and politics. His views in both are perceptibly coloured by the theories of the school to which he belongs, which too much inclines to the forms and institutions of the past to render its suggestions for the improvement of the present very practicable. Thus his well-known pamphlet, the "Plea for National Holidays," is written in a kindly spirit, excited by the "all work and no play" system, which presses so heavily on the present generation. But the days of "merrie England," the morris-dance, and the village green, can never be recalled.

His lordship is of course a Conservative, and "something more;" but it is one of the virtues of Young England that its politics are destitute of bitterness and bigotry. He sits for the borough of Newark, and the present is his first Parliament, as he was returned in the election of 1841. His lordship is tall in person, of dark complexion, and black hair. In speaking, his voice has a rather unpleasant tone, which, however, is considerably lessened when he becomes animated. His speech on Wednesday evening was a good specimen of his style.

A CANADIAN HOAX.—At Montreal a very amusing hoax has been practised on the credulity of her Majesty's liege. The Gazette tells the tale in these words: "On Tuesday a very clever jeu d'esprit was played off, and if we were sure that the fair publishes would not sue us for breach of—copyright, we should certainly publish it in lieu of the news we expected to-day. It consisted of a very specious and business-like newspaper extra, containing the important intelligence received by special express from New York, of the arrival of her Majesty Queen Victoria in Yankee land. It created quite a sensation, and numerous were the inquiries at the newspaper-office, and the Post-office, by the credulous. Mr. Porteous was, of course, unable to give any account of it, being by special express; but this was only set down to official mystery, and his incredulity to versions at the Post-office going beaten. The particulars were full, and the whole narrative could not possibly be more minutely circumstantial. As a sample of the style of the thing, we take the following paragraph:—'The Royal party, after a-publishes. The following gentlemen had the distinguished honour of being presented to Her Majesty on board the General Scott:—Wm. Cunard, Esq. Dalhousie Major Jack Downing (commanding Guard of Honour), the mayor of the city, and the British Consul. The greatest good humour prevailed during the evening. Among the dishes served up by our friend of the Astor, none excited more praise, or seemed to be more heartily relished by her Majesty and the Prince, than the national delicacies of pumpkin pie and apple-sauce; and upon her Majesty's retiring, Prince Albert enjoyed with great zest a go-along with Major Jack Downing, who guessed that his Royal Highness had never liquored so well before."

What a strange discovery it is that the boy makes when he finds himself for the first time in love. What a change does it make in all his previous habits. It was only one day last week that he made a party for a game of cricket, a row on the river, or a determination to go a bird-nesting, or to rob some very fruitful orchard, or overturn some old woman's apple-stall, or to play the crabbed old usher at school, who was fond of taking snuff, the trick of placing live wasps into his snuff box. But what a change has "come o'er the spirit of his dream." In a few days he chooses to remember his past folly. It is all over now. No game is so pleasant as looking at Emma or Lucy, or whatever the loved one's name may be!—no stroll can possibly be agreeable without her. He can think of nothing else; cricket, rowing matches are forgotten; the blushing apple-pie equal not the blushing cheeks; there is nothing funny about the distress of the old apple woman; and as for the crabbed old usher, he wonders whatever it was that could make him so fond of playing tricks upon any one. He will never be so foolish again: he feels himself a man. He is in love!

John Norden, in his account of Middlesex, has the following curious notice of the ancient appearance of St. James's Palace, the passage is not to be found in the printed copy, but is given in the introduction, by Sir Henry Ellis to Norden's "Description of Essex." "It standeth," (he says), "from other buildinges about two furlonges, saving a ferme house, opposite agaynste the northgate. But the seytuacon is pleasant, indeed, with a good ayre and pleasant prospects. On the east, London offereth itself in view; in the south, the stately fabrickes of Westminster, with the pleasant parke, and the delightes thereof on the north, the green feeldes. It was buylded by King Henry the VIII."

FIRE AT WESTON-SUPER-MARE.

On the evening of Friday week, the inhabitants and visitors of the pleasan watering-place of Weston-super-Mare, on the Somersetshire coast, were suddenl alarmed by the cry of "Fire," and the ringing of the bells in the church-tower The scene of the conflagration proved to be Knightstone Baths, the property of Dr. Fox, of which a sketch is annexed. The flames soon burst through the roof and upper windows, and raged with such fury that in a short time the roof fell in; the fire then descended, story after story, till the whole of the house was completely destroyed, with nearly all the furniture. The wind was blowing strong from the south-west at the time, and it was fully expected that the two adjoining houses would have been destroyed; the fire had at one time got into the house known by the name of Arthur's Tower, but it was stopped without doing much damage. At both these houses, we are sorry to hear that a wanton destruction of property took place, by persons who rushed in, tore down the bedsteads piecemeal, and any other furniture they could lay their hands upon; even looking-glasses, china, &c., were thrown from the upper windows and destroyed.

Some of the light-fingered gentry, too, took advantage of this distressing event, and purloined money and other valuables. It appears that the fire originated from a flue. Special messengers were immediately despatched to Bristol, Banwell, and Axbridge, for engines, but only one arrived, and that too late to be serviceable. Had there been a fire-engine in the town, very little damage would have been done.

KNIGHTSTONE BATHS, WESTON-SUPER-MARE.

Weston-super-Mare is what may be termed a railway watering place. It is situated on the Great Western line, about twenty miles from Clifton, and has a fine strand, three miles in length. Several villas and other buildings are in progress; and in the immediate vicinity of the town, plantations of 400 acres have been tastefully laid out in walks, drives, &c. From its beautiful situation, and its contiguity to Cheltenham, Bath, and Clifton, Weston-super-Mare bids fair to become a very popular resort.

HORSE TRAINING.

The training exercises of the racer are of peculiar interest at this moment; and the annexed engraving, representing "The Last Sweat," is a fit sequitur to our illustration of "The Horse Watcher," at page 221.

The process of giving training sweats is to clothe the horse very warmly, and then to walk him to the exercising ground, where he is to be soon started into a canter, which the rider, at a proper time, quickens into a smart gallop over a mile or two. On his return, he increases the pace, yet not so as to "over-mark," that is, distress the horse; but, judging by the difficulty or ease with which he maintains his stride, he allows him to gallop moderately, or he forces him nearly at the top of his speed, where, being stripped and scraped, he is, in many cases, again taken out, and given another brushing gallop.

The system of inordinate sweating is getting out of fashion among trainers in general. Chifney, the celebrated jockey, in his curious work, called "Genius Genuine," remarks:—"It is destruction to sweat horses as they have been sweated at Newmarket. Their sweats being repeated every six days, and sometimes oftener, and between those days of sweating, it is usual for the horses to go out twice a day, each time having strong exercise. In those sweating days the horses were mostly covered with cloths, two or three times doubled, and go in their sweats, six miles, more or less, and at times go tolerably fast." A gentle sweat, however, under moderate clothing, is found to assist the speed and stoutness, particularly of the craving horse. "Longwaist was beaten at Manchester by Granby, by being too lusty; he was, therefore, well sweated, and went to Norton the following week, and there he won the cup easily, beating Granby, who carried four pounds extra, for having won at Manchester; but which extra weight evidently did not win Longwaist the race, as they met on the old terms at Preston, where Longwaist again defeated him, and also Fylde, the winner of the two Chester cups. This serves to show the necessity of training sweatings during the engagements of race horses."—See Blaine's "Encyclopædia of Rural Sports"

EXTRAORDINARY MATCH.—A trotting match for £25 a side came off on Monday morning, between a light bay galloway, thirteen hands, and a bay cob, fourteen hands high. The parties to whom they belong reside in the neighbourhood of Dorset-square, the distance from Regent's-park to Windsor, between twenty-three and twenty-four miles. The galloway was ridden by its owner, and the cob was driven in a heavy gig. The match was won by the saddle horse, which completed the distance in one hour and twenty-five minutes; beating the one in harness by two minutes only. The winner was immediately taken back to town by the railway, but the other, which is greatly distressed, remains at the New Inn, Windsor.

The following extraordinary occurrence took place on Friday week at the barracks in the rue Mouffetard, occupied by the municipal guard. A large black eagle alighted on the roof, and remained for some time perfectly quiet. While the men in the barracks and a large crowd outside were watching the movements of the strange visitor, an officer went to his room for his gun in order to fire at it, but before his return the royal bird rose majestically towards the sky, and, after hovering for a few moments, pounced suddenly down into one of the court-yards, and then soared again with a young puppy in his talons. The loud and shrill acclamations of the numerous spectators so far alarmed the eagle, that, when at about a level with the roof, he dropped his prey, and soared out of sight. The puppy fell into the yard again, but was quite dead, the eagle having mortally wounded it in the neck with its claws. Inquiry was then made at the Garden of Plants, but no eagle was missing there, and the only conjecture left was that the bird had escaped from some private menagerie in the environs of Paris.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

NEWMARKET FIRST SPRING MEETING AND THE DERBY.

Fortunati ambo! si quid mea carmina possunt,
Nulla dies unquam memori vos eximet ævo.—VIRG.

What a transcendant morning was that of the 21st instant, when with heart as light as the swallows that were executing winged Pyrrhas over the emerald-set sea, or turned as from Babylon the second towards Olympia of that ilk. What must have been the magic of nature and the sublimation of our proper physique, that, tinted with the inspiration of the muse, a pilgrimage commenced at Shoreditch, hissing hot with loco-smoko-motives—"think of that Master Brooks!" The eyncsure of those who journeyed with us, whether on rail or turnpike-road, was, of course, the great event, which, from Michaelmas to Whitsuntide, engrosseth all the sympathies and anxieties of the modern Olympian. The Derby, whatever else might be in jeopardy; "Tros Tyrnusve!" Peel or O'Connell—the Derby was settled into a secure triumph for Ratan or the Buck: that was an affair fini. Then the conversation would turn to more immediate events, and the pleasant tryst whither we were bound. Certes—the good old-fashioned horse-race is a most popular pastime, and as much superior in intrinsic interest to its recent illegitimate copy, the steeple-chase, as in its true sporting character. There is something evidently un-English and pre-eminently Champ de Mars-ish, in twelve stone done up with moustaches, jockey cap, and silk jacket, for a race—the ordinary presentment of steeple riding with aristocratic conditions. When grooms and professional gentlemen are put up, it by no means mends the matter, because steeple-chasing is no more a trial of the properties of a hunter, than a Kentucky duel with rifles is of the qualities of the combatants as skilful marksmen. But this is beside our present purpose, which is with the day succeeding that of our descent from town to the vicinity of the Devil's Ditch.

SCENE IN PRIVY GARDENS, WHITEHALL, ON SUNDAY LAST

AN UNWELCOME VISITOR.

On Sunday morning last considerable alarm was occasioned in various parts of Westminster by the appearance of a cow, which had escaped from its owners, in the neighbourhood of the Horseferry-road, and which, being followed by a crowd of boys, was driven to madness, indiscriminately attacking all those who attempted to oppose its course. For nearly two hours did the wretched animal attempt to outrun its pursuers, visiting in turn all the principal streets from Pall-mall to Tothill-street. About twelve o'clock the poor cow, then nearly exhausted, ran down Parliament-street, towards the Treasury, at which time there could not have been less than 2000 persons following it, shouting and hallooing in a disgraceful manner. Avoiding Whitehall, the poor beast turned into Privy-gardens, and finding the garden-gate of the Premier (Sir Robert Peel) standing open, immediately took refuge therein, to the no small alarm of the attendants in the hall. The gates were instantly closed by those who followed, and one or two persons, provided with ropes, scaled the railings, and attempted to secure the animal. In this they were unsuccessful; for, impatient of confinement, the cow, after a moment's pause, cleared the gate at a bound, and again pursued her way towards Charing-cross. Before, however, she had proceeded many yards, a butcher contrived to cast the noose of a long coil of rope over her horns, and with some difficulty she was drawn up against the railings, and ultimately made fast. The poor animal, which had seriously injured itself in endeavouring to break away from the railings, was led, bleeding and almost exhausted, homeward. There were no less than thirty policemen among those in pursuit, and they had the greatest difficulty in keeping the crowd out of danger. Fortunately, no accident of importance occurred.

HORSE-TRAINING.

The second Spring Meeting, though it extends over five days, can boast but two of much account; a number, indeed, which only Epsom beside can lay claim to. The Newmarket Derby Day is that on which the Two Thousand Guinea Stakes is run for; its Oaks Day, that of the One Thousand. To the former of these our notice may be conveniently confined, because it was the only issue having reference to matters immediately affecting the great event of the season. The Two Thousand, generally a touchstone (or so considered) of the Derby, this year contained among its nominations the first favourite by convention for that race—and one backed at long odds to win the richest of the Newmarket stakes. The Ugly Buck, who, as a two-year-old, won a solitary race, in slovenly style at Goodwood, was forthwith elected premier for the betting market during the winter, and in that capacity made his appearance at the starting post, hard by the Ditch, on Tuesday last. It is needless to allude to the interest that marked this exhibition, which drew to the heath the greatest crowd that has mustered there probably within the present century. The field for this important stake consisted of seven, out of an entry of twenty-five. The reasons for this abridgment would disclose the singular machinery of racing, but they are too complex and too professional for a journal of this description. As before said, seven came to the post, namely, The Ugly Buck, with 5 to 1 on him, The Devil to Pay, Joe Lovell, the Wadastra colt, Algernon, Esmi, and Dr. Phillimore. As soon as they got off, The Devil made strong running, The Buck leading about half a length, and the others well up to the bushes, where the four last-named were beaten. Down the fall, from this point, the three raced together, The Buck winning by a neck only—and that as much as he could do. The Devil was second, of whom his owner, Lord George Bentinck, thought so little that he refused to take 1000 to 10 about him! This race has wholly destroyed all prospect of such a horse as The Buck winning the Derby, whatever his market-price may seem to do for his hopes—or those of his backers. His legs are very faulty; his form all over moderate; his pretensions two stone under those of a first class racer. Dr. Phillimore the stable companion of Running Rein, made a dead heat for last. Thus did the Two Thousand bear upon the Epsom event, which on Thursday at noon remained but little affected by the Newmarket running—always excepting in so far as relates to Ratan. This is the smartest three-year old the season has shown us—and if he can stay the distance, which we doubt, he will be a dangerous Derby horse to be against. Next to him the best of his year out is Skelcton, winner of the 50 sovs sweepstakes on Monday. Now, this filly was beaten in the autumn a dozen lengths for the £50 place, T.Y.C. by Running Rein—what of him for Epsom? To our thinking, the Derby is still an open race, spite of the golden opinions pronounced by the odds. Chester will give us something probably of mark, and Scott's lot is, even now, no forlorn hope. There was no Chester Cup betting during the early part of the week—the Oaks also was a dead letter.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, APRIL 27, 1844.

THE Parliamentary return of the business of the week is absolutely nil; it has been entirely absorbed by the discussion of a personal matter, on the general merits of which we have remarked elsewhere. There is something in such altercations that unfits men for the routine of business; that is merely the concern of the nation—and the nation can wait. Something, too, by way of excuse, may be set down to the nature of the questions to which attempts were made to draw the attention of the House, after the "contention fierce" of the accusers and the accused. On Tuesday evening, Mr. Borthwick endeavoured to raise a discussion on the policy of restoring to the Clergy of the Church, the right or practice of meeting in convocation. On those involved in the material and worldly interests of the day, such a subject in the hands of such an advocate, could have no hold—and the argument was cut short by the summary process of "counting out," when the House had been reduced to a mere skeleton, the United Kingdom being at the moment represented by twenty-seven members.

On Wednesday the same fate overtook Mr. French in an attempt to revive the threadbare topic of the mangled, mismanaged, and mysterious Jury List of the City of Dublin. This question had not even the novelty of having been totally forgotten, like the Convocation of the Clergy, which had all the freshness of history and antiquity. So often has that unhappy Jury List been debated, that it is a question altogether worn out, although not an old one. It is fairly "used up," and as the weather was fine, and the dinner-hour had arrived, the House got rid of it as soon as possible by another "count."

On Thursday the House did not meet, in consequence of its being the celebration of her Majesty's birth-day.

SIR R. PEEL, in answer to a question as to the refusal of a commander of an English ship of war, stationed at Alicant, during the late insurrection, to receive on board Colonel Bonet and his companions, who, in consequence of that refusal, were taken and inhumanly butchered in cold blood, has given an explanation which, if it proves anything, shows that English officers do not at all times make a sufficiently liberal use of the "discretion in particular cases," which it seems they are allowed to exercise. We think an error on the side of humanity is generally a safe one, and that the protection of an English ship might have been afforded to those wretched men, when, for the bloody vengeance which seems to have been almost the only ruling principle of Spanish military statesmen, it must have been known that the refusal to give it amounted to a sentence of death. It is of no avail now to treat of these transactions; the victims are in their graves, and their murderers bear about with them the rewards and honours bestowed on them by the "Most Christian" Christina.

All that can be done is to regret the occurrence of scenes that are a disgrace to humanity at large, and to hope that in future those English officers who may be placed in similar circumstances, may meet with that little generous humanity may be exercised at "their own discretion." If they can prevent the occurrence of such a scene as that which took place at the gate of Alicant—even though they should trench by a hair's breadth on a "strict neutrality"—they may be assured the country will bear them out in so doing. We hope a disposition to do this will be encouraged by the expression which Sir R. Peel gave to his feelings of indignation at these atrocities, and which we feel pleasure in repeating here, by quoting his own words:—"On a question of this nature he should always take an opportunity of expressing his disgust at the wholesale massacres of prisoners without trial which were going on in Spain, as doing more to injure the character of Spain in the eyes of the civilized world, than any other course of action which her Government could pursue. He could not have believed that members of civilised nations could have exhibited such conduct; and he thought that barbarous nations would have shown more humanity in their contests with one another than had been observed by both parties in Spain."

WE are sorry to perceive, by the foreign intelligence of the week, that the paltry affair of Otaheite, which in England scarcely excites a thought, is still magnified in France to a serious cause of quarrel. This almost imperceptible spot on the earth's surface has given rise to more discussion, or almost as much, as the partition of Poland. We know that "greatly to find quarrel in a straw, when honour is at stake," is a proof of courage and sensibility, if not of prudence. But we should be most unfeignedly sorry if this potato-patch of earth, which, as far as the rest of the world is concerned, seems in it, but not of it—"in a great pool a swan's nest"—should lead to any strife more dangerous than the war of words. The Paris papers are very barren of news, but the dominions of Queen Pomare are an abundant source of speculation. Here is the latest:—It is stated that an arrangement has been made with the English Government, by which the French possession of Otaheite is to be confirmed, and an equivalent to be given—first, by the recall of the French expedition to China, and next, by the partition between England and France of the island of St. Domingo.

The credit of originating this absurd report is generally given to the Patrie, but all the other journals have adopted it with great alacrity, coupled with no small amount of denunciation of "perfidious Albion." We copy from the Herald the following remarks on this amicable adjustment:—"How the Chinese expedition, which sailed some weeks since, is to be recalled, these papers forget to mention, as well as the process by which the black masters of St. Domingo are to be ejected from their lands, and the island to be divided between its former owners and our good selves. The Constitutionnel discovers that the black gentlemen of St. Domingo, not having paid the dividends on the Haytian loan, the French Government has an equitable lien on their goods and chattels, whilst England, by a hocus-pocus, which is not very clearly explained, is to take possession of the side of the island inhabited by Spaniards, as a set-off for its claims on the treasury of Madrid; and the democratic Pacifique, to crown the whole, states that the French Government has resolved to pay in hard cash to Queen Pomare the value of Otaheite, and to establish her as full sovereign on a little island not far removed from her actual dominions."

France, which was more than suspected of stirring up insurrection in Spain, has given, and is giving, every discouragement to the insurrectionary movements in Italy. It is stated in the Commerce, that M. Guizot has addressed a circular to the several Italian Governments, undertaking to give them all possible moral support, and to expel from the soil of France, or its African colony, any political refugee known to be engaged in any conspiracy against these States.

As a pendant to the above, a letter from Barcelona states that seven unfortunate persons, suspected only of being Carlists and refugees, had, within a few days preceding its date, been shot within the Spanish frontiers. Are these legitimate disturbers of states worth all the blood that is shed for them and by them?

The domestic intelligence from France is not interesting. The Chamber has been discussing at great length the New Prison Reform Bill. There is a disposition on the part of the Government to adopt, to some extent, the Penitentiary system. We only hope that it will not adopt the "solitary" plan, which is converting the tenants of our prisons into the occupants of madhouses. The following is a good statement of the case and its difficulties:—"The present condition of the French large prisons is admitted to be execrable, as they have become complete schools of crime; but the difficulty of reform is very great, first, on account of the great expense it will occasion, and next, by the difficulty of choosing between solitary imprisonment and what is called 'seclusion.' The first, it is admitted, leads to mental imbecility and to madness—the strongest mind and the most stubborn spirit cannot resist—while the latter offers the advantages of combining the separation of convicts from evil communication, with full opportunity of witnessing each other's work, and of feeling that the world and the sight of fellow-creatures are not for ever excluded. The French Government and the Commission, through the organ of its reporter, M. de Tocqueville, propose the adoption of the Philadelphia system, subject to such slight variations as the nature of the French criminal demands."

LORD BROUGHAM, who seems indefatigable, has just addressed a long letter to Mr. Scoble on the effect of any alteration in our sugar duties on the great question of slavery. If there is any one question on which his Lordship has been consistent, it is that of slavery. He has been, and is, a strong enemy of the whole of the degrading system. We confess we cannot see so clearly as his lordship the line of demarcation between the use of slave-grown produce and the produce of free labour. Up till a comparatively few years ago, the whole of the sugar consumed in these countries was slave-grown, and all that is imported, and refined, under bond, for exportation, (not for consumption here,) may be, and is, slave-grown still. The whole of our supply of cotton is grown by slaves; but this objection his Lordship gets over by stating that no slaves are "imported" into the Southern States of the Union. But are they not "bred" there? The whole of the question is surrounded with difficulties. The following paragraph of his Lordship's letter is characteristic, and contains the pith of his objection to buying of States that uphold and continue the system of slavery:—

As to any commercial policy which the country may adopt exerting much influence upon the legislatures of the slave-settlements, or their planters, my hopes are, I confess, not sanguine; because I well know the spirit of gambling speculation which prevades those nations, always agitating the mass, and mixing itself with the great body of the people. But, if any course of conduct can have any such an influence, it is assuredly that which all reflecting abolitionists recommend—the withholding our market against slave-grown sugar, and opening them to the produce of free labour. The plan of the extraordinary, though perfectly well-meant letter, of which you have sent me a copy, is one from which surely no thinking person ever can hope for the smallest practical effect, namely, the "powerful operation of English anti-slavery opinion upon Brazilian slavery opinion." The proposition is to offer them gold to continue the slave-trade, and to preach them a sermon to give it up. One can hardly doubt which of these exhortations will prove the most efficacious. Even the "benevolent sections of individuals, or of Anti Slavery Societies," to which the writers of the letter would confine all our efforts with foreign states, seem to offer a most remote and doubtful prospect of any real good. When coupled with the grand remedy for slavery and the slave-trade, of admitting all at once into our markets as much sugar as negro slave labour can yield to the last, such a resource can hardly be seriously relied on by any rational person.

THE COURT AND HAUT TON.

The Queen and Prince Albert, his Majesty the King of the Belgians, her Royal Highness the Duches of Kent, the ladies and gentlemen of the royal suite, and the household, attended divine service on Sunday morning at the Chapel Royal, Buckingham Palace. His Majesty the King of the Belgians held a diplomatic levee at Buckingham Palace, on Saturday, for the reception of the foreign ministers. The royal dinner party at Buckingham Palace, on Saturday, included her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, Lady Anna Maria Dawson, the French Ambassador, and the Countess de St. Aulaire, his Excellency M. Van de Weyer, the Duke and Duchess of Buccleuch, and the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone. His Royal Highness Prince Albert visited the new Houses of Parliament on Saturday, and spent upwards of two hours in inspecting the works. Her Majesty the Queen Dowager attended divine service on Sunday morning in the Chapel Royal, St. James's. The sermon was preached by the Rev. Montagu Wyvard, who took his text from Ecclesiastes, chap. xi., verses 7 and 8. The prayers were read by the Rev. Horsley Dakins, and the lessons by the Rev. Dr. Rudge. The musical service, in D, was Sir George Smart's; the anthem was "My God, my God." Sir George Smart presided at the organ. Sir R. Peel had a lengthened audience of the King of the Belgians, on Sunday, at Buckingham Palace.

On Monday the Duchess of Kent visited the Queen and partook of a déjeûne with her Majesty and Prince Albert, the King and Queen of the Belgians, and the Prince of Leiningen, at Buckingham Palace. The Prince of Leiningen paid visits (to take leave) to the Queen Dowager, the Duchess of Gloucester, and other members of the royal family.

On Tuesday morning her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, accompanied by the Prince of Leiningen, her son, and attended by Sir George Couper, left Clarence House for a lengthened sojourn on the Continent.

On Wednesday her Majesty and Prince Albert took their accustomed early walk in the Gardens of Buckingham Palace. Prince Albert rode out afterwards on horseback, attended by Colonel Bouverie. The royal dinner party included M. Van de Weyer Sir James and Lady Graham, and the Hon. Mrs. Anson.

HER MAJESTY'S BIRTHDAY.—Thursday being specially appointed for the celebration of Her Majesty's birthday, the morning was ushered in by the ringing of merry peals, the ships in the river being decorated with flags, and the principal public buildings and many of the churches having the royal standard floating in the breeze at an early hour. At ten o'clock a numerous assemblage of well-dressed persons were congregated on the parade in St. James's Park, to witness the inspection of the household troops. The 1st Life Guards formed on the right of the Infantry, and were attended by their band in their state clothing, as also by their splendid kettle-drums—presented to them by Henry IV. on the occasion of the Queen's birthday, the united bands of the Foot Guards attend the parade, forming a reunion of military music not to be surpassed. The troops wore their new clothing, and looked extremely well. They went through their evolutions in a most soldierlike manner, and to the satisfaction of the illustrious personages and distinguished officers present:—Field Marshal Leopold, King of the Belgians; his Royal Highness Prince Albert; the Commander-in-Chief, the Duke of Wellington, and his staff, were present, comprising Lord Fitzroy Somerset, Sir James Macdonald, Marquis of Douro, Sir Edward Bowater, the Marquis of Worcester, Sir Charles Dalbiac, &c. We also noticed the Gold Stick (Viscount Combermere), and the Earl of Effingham. At one o'clock a double royal salute was fired by the Tower and Park guns; and similar salutes were fired at all the naval stations and military garrisons in the United Kingdom.

DEPARTURE OF THE DUCHESS OF KENT FOR THE CONTINENT.—On Tuesday last, at twenty minutes past twelve o'clock, her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, attended by her son, the Prince of Leiningen, Sir George Couper, and Lady Anna Maria Dawson, and suite, arrived at the Dover terminus of the South Eastern Railway, in the royal carriage, and by special train. A royal salute from the Grand Redoubt welcomed the arrival of the royal duchess, who was received at the station by Colonel Rice Jones, the commandant of the garrison; Colonel Mercer, Major Raines, Lieutenant Cornwell, Captain Smithett, and other naval and military officers, and a guard of honour of the 77th Regiment, who were drawn up on the quay, under the command of Captain Clarke. Her Royal Highness on alighting from the train, walked to Archcliff-square, from whence a short carriage conveyed the royal duchess to Cross-wall quay, where her Majesty's steam-packet the Princess Alice was in readiness to transport her Royal Highness to Boulogne. Her Royal Highness was conducted from the carriage on board the Princess Alice by Captain Mercer, and on her landing having been thrown off, the vessel left the harbour about twenty minutes to one o'clock, under a royal salute, amid cheering and waving of hats and handkerchiefs on the part of the numerous spectators who crowded the pier. The military band in attendance playing a favourite air. Her Royal Highness (who was dressed in deep mourning) looked remarkably well, and seemed highly gratified at the attentions of all around her. The weather was uncommonly fine, and scarce a ripple disturbed the surface of the water, so that her Royal Highness must have experienced an exceedingly pleasant as well as quick passage to Boulogne, whence she proceeds to Paris.

THE ROYAL HOUSEHOLD.—It is strongly rumoured about the court, and we have good grounds for believing the report to be correct, that Mr. G. E. Anson (the private secretary to his Royal Highness Prince Albert) will shortly be appointed to the important and highly confidential situation of private secretary to the Queen. It may not be generally known that the Baroness Lehzen acted in this capacity in the household of the Sovereign up to the period of her retirement, now about eighteen months ago.

CHURCH, UNIVERSITIES, &c.

The head mastership of King Edward the Sixth's School, Macclesfield, has been conferred on the Rev. H. J. Owen, B.A., of St. John's College, Cambridge, third master in Huddersfield College. The rev. gentleman resigns the latter appointment.

The Rev. Jacob Hughes, M.A., curate of Llanrian, Pembrokeshire, has been instituted to that vicarage, vacant by the resignation of the Rev. Josiah Rees.

OXFORD.—In accordance with the instructions contained in the will of John Hampton, M.A., some time Canon of Salisbury, the Heads of Colleges met on Tuesday morning and elected the Rev. Charles Able Heurtley, B.D., late Fellow of Corpus Christi College, and rector of Fenny Compton, Warwickshire, Bampton Lecturer for the ensuing year. The Margaret Professor of Divinity will begin a course of lectures on Monday, May 9, at one o'clock. The Praelector of Logic will read the Topics of Aristotle on Mondays, Wednesdays, and Fridays during the present term, commencing on Monday next. The Boden Professor of Sanscrit will commence his lectures at the Clarendon, on Monday, the 6th of May, at two o'clock. The Reader in Geology began his course of lectures on the composition, structure, and physical resemblance of the earth, and the distribution in animal and vegetable nature that have attended them, on Thursday, at the Clarendon, at two o'clock. The lectures will be continued on Tuesdays, Thursdays, and Saturdays, during Easter and Act Terms. The Regius Professor of Modern History proposes to read with a class, during this and the following terms, a course of Italian history.

On Wednesday the Lord Bishop of London commenced his annual course of confirmations for the metropolis and suburbs at Christ Church, Newgate-street. The night rev. prelate arrived shortly before eleven o'clock, and took his seat on the north side of the altar, the south side being occupied by his lordship's chaplain, the Rev. Charles Dalton, M.A., Fellow of Wadham College, Oxford. Prayers having been read by the Rev. Michael Gibbs, M.A., Vicar of Christchurch, the bishop ascended the pulpit, and delivered a solemn and impressive address to the candidates for the holy rite of confirmation. Upwards of 350 young women, and 340 young men were confirmed. Amongst the latter were 140 youths belonging to Christ's Hospital. The service was then read by the bishop, who closed the proceedings by pronouncing the apostolic benediction. Monday, May 6th, Parish Church of St. Mary, Islington; Tuesday, 7th, St. James's Church, Clerkenwell; Wednesday, 8th, Parish Church of St. Philip's Church, Stepney; Monday, May 13th, Parish Church of St. Marylebone; Wednesday, May 15th, St. Luke's Church, Chelsea. His lordship intends holding a series of confirmations in that part of his diocese situate in Essex, during the course of the autumn.

On Monday evening a meeting of the Incorporated Society for the Enlargement, Building, and Repairing Churches and Chapels took place at their Chambers, St. Martin's-place, Trafalgar-square, to examine into several urgent cases of deficient accommodation and applications for aid submitted to them from various parishes in England and Wales. His Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury presided on this occasion. Amongst the business transacted at the meeting the most important were the grants voted towards the erection of thirteen additional churches, the rebuilding, with enlargement, of three existing churches and chapels, and the enlarging, or otherwise increasing the accommodation in seven other churches, making twenty-three grants in all. The amount of money voted by the meeting for the twenty-three grants voted on this occasion in aid of the works just referred to is £3,340.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

DISSENTERS' CHAPELS BILL.—On Thursday a numerous meeting of dissenters and others was held at the Freemasons' Tavern, Great Queen-street, for the purpose of adopting measures respecting the above-mentioned bill, and other matters connected with churches and dissenting chapels generally. The meeting was announced for twelve o'clock, but the chair was not taken until past one o'clock, when Mr. Rennington Mills was called on to preside. The proceedings having commenced in the usual manner, the chairman addressed the meeting briefly alluding to the bill now before Parliament for the regulation of Dissenting chapels. He considered that the bill in question was intended for the benefit of a small body of Dissenters, the Unitarians, against whom no charge had been proven in the course of law, which held that a large amount of property in their possession was the property of Presbyterians, and other Trinitarian bodies, and consequently that they had no legal title to it. They had met to assist for the purpose of discussing the principles of the Unitarians, or in order to take from them any property for religious purposes legally theirs (hear, hear); but he protested against any bill being sanctioned that would reverse a just decision of the courts of law. (Hear, hear.) He, therefore, was of opinion that other religious bodies should come forward and protest against the bill in question.—The Rev. Mr. Blackburne next addressed the meeting at length on the subject of Unitarianism, which created much confusion. Resolutions, in accordance with the object of the meeting, were finally agreed to, and the meeting separated.

THE LONDON INSTITUTION.—On Thursday afternoon the annual general meeting of the proprietors and subscribers of this institution was held in the theatre of the Institute, Finsbury Circus, Sir Thomas Baring, Bart., in the chair. The institution was founded in the year 1805 by the principal merchants and bankers of the City of London, headed by Sir Francis Baring, Bart. and M.P., for the purpose of establishing a library and reading-room, and to provide men of eminence in every branch of science and learning to deliver lectures for the diffusion of useful knowledge among the citizens. Since then, the institution, which is incorporated by Act of Parliament, has rapidly progressed, and it now ranks among the first, the most successful, and praiseworthy establishments that adorn the British metropolis. William Tite, Esq., F.R.S., secretary, read the annual report, which stated that the institution had been very successful, and their members had been productive of greater pleasure and advantage than any other similar institution. The receipts had been £3657 4s. 5d., and the payments £3286, leaving a balance in the treasurer's hands of £388 19s. 5d. The funded property of the institution amounted to £857,63s. The report having been adopted, a committee of management was appointed for the ensuing year, and the customary vote of thanks being awarded to the chairman, the meeting terminated.

BAPTIST MISSIONARY SOCIETY.—On Thursday Exeter Hall was completely crowded in every part by an immense multitude, who filled galleries and platform unfortunately, to celebrate the annual meeting of this most extensive and beneficent society. W. B. Gurney, Esq., took the chair. The Rev. J. Angus, M.A., read the report, from which it appeared that 192 agents were in the service of the society, which had increased its sphere of usefulness and was acting with renewed vigour. The Rev. William Brock, of Norwich, and most of the influential gentlemen on the platform, moved and seconded resolutions in support of the society, which met with a most hearty response from the meeting.

MARYLEBONE DISTRICT SOCIETIES.—From the Reports from the several districts, it appears that, during the past year, 3801 persons had been relieved by their visitations; and that the sums distributed amounted to £1952 6s. 1½d.

EXTRAORDINARY FEAT IN DRIVING.—On Tuesday considerable curiosity and wonder were exhibited by crowds of persons assembled in the principal streets of the West-end of the metropolis, to witness the performance of Mr. Emsley, the owner of the horse to Mr. Batty's establishment, "Astley's Amphitheatre," in driving twenty highly-trained horses—a feat never before attempted—attached to a four-wheel carriage, containing twenty persons, at full speed through the streets of the metropolis, without the slightest apparent difficulty, and without a single accident occurring—a feat which must be considered extraordinary from the crowded state of the streets with vehicles of all descriptions at this time of the year.

THE WILL FORGERIES

THE SENTENCES.

Shortly after ten o'clock on Monday morning the judges, Mr. Baron Gurney, Mr. Justice Williams, and Mr. Justice Maule, having taken their seats upon the bench at the Central Criminal Court,

Mr. Phinn rose and said that his client, William Sanders, had intimated to him his wish to retract his plea of "Not Guilty," and plead "Guilty" to the indictment against him in the case of MARY HUNT; and, after careful consideration of the evidence in the case, his learned friend (Mr. Stone) and himself had come to the determination that the result must be the same in effect if the trial should be proceeded with. He wished their lordships would permit him to advert to the condition in life in which the prisoner moved, and to mention that he was a man of inferior education to the other prisoners, and that after a long course of unfortunate, but, as he hoped, honest, though unsuccessful, industry, he had been led by men of superior judgment to commit the offence with which he was charged.

Mr. Straight, the clerk of the arraigns, then called upon the prisoner, and told him he was charged with unlawfully and wickedly disposing and causing to be put in a will purporting to be the last will and testament of MARY HUNT, and asked him whether he pleaded Guilty or Not Guilty.—Sanders: I wish to plead Guilty.

Mr. Wilkins said there were two other cases to be tried—the one just mentioned, and another against Mr. Barber; and he (Mr. Wilkins) could only say on the part of his client, that Mr. Barber, that he was particularly anxious that those cases should be tried, and that he should, in reference to the case which he has elected has been convicted, use every constitutional privilege which the law allowed him to render it nugatory, by appealing to the highest tribunals in the land. The learned gentleman expressed his own conviction that the seven first trials were not to be proceeded with was that it was felt by the prosecution that they did not dare to proceed.—Mr. Erle said it would be improper now to advert to his convictions in reference to this case.—Mr. Wilkins, in a subdued sensitive tone, asked to know whether it was the intention of the learned counsel to allow an acquittal in regard to the other prisoners, or to enter a nolle prosequi?—Mr. Erle said when he was called on to decide what course he intended to pursue, he should be ready to do so.

Mr. Wilkins complained of an allusion to his client, which his learned friend Mr. Phinn had made. Mr. Phinn denied that he had in any way alluded to Mr. Wilkins's client. He had carefully abstained from doing so.

Mr. Wilkins.—His learned friend had spoken of his client having been tempted by persons of superior judgment.—Mr. Justice Maule said the Court had not understood that any allusion had been made to Mr. Barber.

The judges then retired to consult on what course they should take, and, after an absence of about a quarter of an hour, they returned into court, upon which

Mr. Straight, having called the prisoners severally by name, told them they had been convicted of felony, and asked them what they had to say why the sentence of the Court should not be passed upon them?

Mr. Barber then, in a clear tone of voice, and in a very calm and unembarrassed manner, proceeded to make a long speech to the Court, in order to show that he had been made the victim of Fletcher. He said he was aware that in questions put to him implied whether he had any legal objection to make. He trusted, however, that their lordships would not preclude him from making some observations on the general nature of the case upon which he had been convicted, more particularly as no witnesses were called for his defence. He did not mean by this to cast the least reflection on his counsel, to whom he could never be too grateful, and whose able defence would command the eternal gratitude. He wished to say, however, that at the conclusion of the learned gentleman's speech, had he (Mr. Barber) been asked whether he thought it necessary to have any witnesses called, he should have said he did not think it was. He had, however, very important evidence which he might have called in support of deception had been practised against him by that man (pointing to Mr. Fletcher).

Mr. Fletcher.—No, no.

Mr. Barber said he had never had any desire to increase Mr. Fletcher's difficulties, but the frightful circumstances in which he was placed were owing to Mr. Fletcher. All the misery he had suffered had been brought about by him, and was attributable to that confidence which he was induced to repose in Mr. Fletcher, whom he had not the least reason to suspect up to the present time. He hoped he would be able to satisfy their lordships by a few remarks on the assertions of this kind. He then went on to say that he would explain the course which had been adopted towards him by Fletcher, in reference to Miss Slack, whose property he conceived he had been already laid hold of by Fletcher, but the most important feature in the history of this transaction he could not bring before their lordships. It was this. Fletcher said it is likely that this lady (Miss Slack) was entitled to the stock. He (Barber) had said he did not think there was much doubt of it, and thought it must be so. He said, however, there was a means by which he could decide the matter most completely, and that if Mr. Barber would procure the handwriting he would send it from Fletcher as to the result of that comparison, he had no means of verifying it; but Fletcher told him that the handwriting did not agree at all, and that his friend had compared it with the signature in the Bank books, and that the name of the signature in the Bank books was that of an elderly person, while the signature of Miss Slack was that of a young lady, and that it was therefore quite certain that she was not the owner of the stock. He (Barber) had said he was astonished and surprise, but Fletcher said he was quite satisfied, and stated that the lady had executed a power of attorney before the dividends on the stock had ceased to be received. He entreated their lordships to remember that Fletcher had also said that Miss Slack was about twenty-seven years of age; he admitted that in his evidence Fletcher upon this said it could not be the same party, as she would not have been competent to make a power of attorney at the period at which she had executed it, if she was only twenty-seven years of age then. Coupling these facts together, he had come to the conclusion, firmly and honestly, that Miss Slack was not the same person as the individual whose stock was invested, but that she was quite a different party. In a letter which he had written to Mr. Baxter (Captain Foskett's attorney), he (Mr. Barber) had promised that if the right party had been found out he would give him information of it, for the satisfaction of the young lady and the family. Now, when he wrote that letter he intended either to keep that promise or he did not. If he intended to keep it, it could not be argued that he has a guilty knowledge, and if he did not, he should not have made it, as it was perfectly unnecessary; but he did make it, and he intended to have kept it, and he did keep it. He did not, unfortunately, write a letter, but after this party (Emma Slack) had come forward, he met Mr. Baxter in Lincoln's Inn-fields, and informed him that the person who was really the owner had come forward and produced a will. Mr. Baxter said, "Ah, indeed!" and the correspondence between them stopped, and that casual meeting was a great misfortune to him (Barber), for, had he not met Mr. Baxter, he should have written a letter, which would have been copied in his books, and have been produced at the trial. He (Mr. Barber) had deceived him in reference to the handwriting, but he was not quite sure that Mr. Fletcher had not been deceived himself. It appeared from the evidence of Mr. Nathaniel Smith, he gave evidence, that Fletcher, when signing the receipt, whether he did or not, it certainly appeared he stated that Miss Slack, of Abbot's Langley, was not the owner of the stock. Mr. Fletcher produced to him (Barber) the letter he intended to send to the Bank of England and the Bank. He (Barber) never knew who that friend was till after this prosecution had been commenced. He spoke of him simply as a friend at the Bank. The extract from the letter he intended to send there was stated in the Bank standing in the name of Miss Slack, formerly of Smith-street, Chelsea, now of Abbot's Langley, but that was not the same person. During this time he attended a case at the Court of Chancery, in which his partner, Mr. Brabant, was concerned, and he (Barber) was desired by Fletcher to go to Mr. Brabant's residence, Lisson, he declared, over and over, that he was misled by Fletcher; that he had been Fletcher's victim. He then appealed to the life of industry and respectability which he had led from boyhood to the present time, and the charges made against him.—Mr. Jardine considered that there was no charge against him to warrant his detention for forgery; but, in case anything further should be forthcoming, he should require heavy bail for his appearance. The bail was fixed for himself in £1000, and two sureties in £500 each. The bail was immediately found. The female prisoner was committed for trial for forgery, and bail refused, although she was near her confinement. She went into hysterics, screamed loudly in court, and fainted away during the proceedings.

FOREIGN.

SPAIN.—The accounts from Madrid are to the 18th. According to one of the Government journals, the Castellano, reports of a marriage between the Queen and the eldest son of Don Carlos were current in the capital, and generally believed. Her Majesty, it was expected, would set out for Catalonia about the beginning of May. It is said she is suffering under a scrofulous complaint, and that her medical attendants have recommended the use of sulphurous waters.

General Prim has left Madrid on eight months' leave, having refused to take the command of the Morocco expedition. He comes to France and England, and it is said that his object in visiting us is to meet Espartero, and to make up matters with him.

GREECE.—From Athens we learn that a new cabinet had been formed. Condurriotti had been appointed Minister of Marine and President of the Council; Mavrocordato, Minister of Finance; Coletti, Minister of the Interior; Tricoupi, Minister for Foreign Affairs; Somachi, Minister of Justice; and Metaxa, Minister of War. The Minister of Ecclesiastical Affairs and Public Instruction had not been appointed.

THE IRISH STATE TRIALS.

DUBLIN, Thursday.

THE NEW TRIAL MOTION.

Shortly after 11 o'clock this morning the judges took their seats on the bench. Mr. O'Connell and the other traversers were present. The court was completely filled. The Attorney and Solicitor-Generals, and nearly all the counsel engaged in the case, were present.

Mr. Whiteside then rose, and moved for a new trial, on the several grounds contained in the notice already published. The address of the learned gentleman was distinguished for legal acuteness than for eloquence or public interest. The first ground of his objection was, that there was no such person on the jury as John Rigby, the gentleman who impersonated him being John Jasus Rigby, who was neither on the panel, or summoned to attend. He cited a considerable number of cases, to convince the Court that but 11 jurors actually tried the late issue. His next had reference to the "abstraction" of the names from the jury list—then to the judge's charge—next, to the evidence which was admitted for the prosecution. The learned gentleman argued at great length, that the violent ballad sold at Mullaghmast should not have been received in evidence. At the time of the learned gentleman's departure, Mr. Whiteside had not finished his law argument. The learned gentleman will resume his address to-morrow morning.

Their Majesties the King and Queen of the Belgians and suite are not expected to leave Buckingham Palace for the Continent until the close of next week. His Majesty's illustrious sister, her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, after a brief visit to the Court of the Tuileries, proceeds, attended by Lady Anna Maria Dawson, and Sir George Couper, to Berne, where her elder sister, the Duchess Julienne of Saxe Coburg, has long been resident.

Yesterday was the anniversary of the natal day of her Royal Highness the Duchess of Gloucester, aunt to the Queen, who completed her 68th year.

MR. B. WOOD, M.P.—We have heard, with much regret, that this gentleman, who has been for some time in indifferent health, has been lately attacked by paralysis in person a character of so common occurrence at this severe season.

SHAKSPEARE SOCIETY.—Yesterday, the annual meeting of the members of this society was held at the Office, St. Martin's-place, Trafalgar-square. The Marquis of Cornwallis, who presided, opened the proceedings by making a few observations congratulatory of the prosperous state of the institution. The secretary then read the report for the third year of the society, which commenced by congratulating the members on its permanent establishment. It next referred, at some length, to the publication and editing of works illustrative of the several productions of Shakspeare, and also detailed a list of works remaining in the committee's possession by the committee. The report concluded by expressing thanks to the several noblemen and gentlemen that had patronised the society. From the financial statement it appeared that the society had received £337 11s. 6d., leaving a balance of £327 11s. 6d., of which 7s. 7d. The expenditure was £664 4s. 1d., leaving a balance with the treasurer of £329 3s. 6d. It further appeared that there were outstanding subscriptions of £247, including those for previous years. The report having been received and adopted in the usual manner, thanks were passed to the noble chairman, who, having acknowledged the compliment, dissolved the meeting.

The large estate, near Boston, the property of Lord Monson, was sold on Thursday, at the Auction Mart, by Mr. George Robins, for £7,100 guineas, to Mr. Malcolm, the former M.P. for Boston. The purchase money is £7,245 5s., Lord Monson's estate. The result seems to be twenty-nine years' purchase on the clear rental.

ENGLISH THEATRICALS FOR HOLLAND.—In consequence of the approaching Dutch fair at Rotterdam, to be held during the ensuing month, three companies of English comedians, tragedians, dancers, musicians, &c., amounting, it is said, to upwards of 200 persons, have been engaged from London, and will leave this country at the commencement of the next week.

FALMOUTH, April 25.—This morning, the Bucephalus, East Indiaman, Captain Fulcher, arrived off here, and landed passengers. She left the Sand Heads, Calcutta, on Jan. 9; Cape of Good Hope, Feb. 21; and St. Helena, on March 13. The abolition of the harbour and light dues at the Cape was the cause of much satisfaction both to the shipmasters and also to the colonists.

DESTRUCTIVE FIRE ON THE THAMES.—LOSS OF AN INDIAMAN.—At about half-past twelve o'clock on Thursday afternoon a large barque, which was being towed down the river from the London Docks, on arriving opposite Gravesend, was discovered to be on fire, and an alarm being given, the tug-steamer towing her made for Bessett Sand, about a quarter of a mile below the new sunken ship is the Woodall, of Liverpool, with an outward bound cargo for the Cape of Good Hope, Calcutta, and Sydney, having several passengers for the two former places, and emigrants for the latter place, on board, all of whom were safely landed at Gravesend and the opposite shore.

THREE LIVES LOST.—On Wednesday last a powerful steam-boiler, employed by Messrs. Hipkins and Green, brewers, at Chiddingford, Hoarsdifen, suddenly burst asunder, and destroyed everything around it. Three individuals were killed; and Mr. Green was severely scalded.

POLICE.—BOW-STREET.—THE FORGERY ON MESSRS. SMITH'S BANK.—John S. Francis, an officer in the Cape of Good Hope Mounted Rifles, and Mary Ann Brown, an elegantly dressed young lady, of extremely good countenance, were brought up before Mr. Jardine, charged with forging various cheques of large amount, purporting to be drawn by the lowager Lady Nelthorpe, the widow of the late Admiral Sir John Nelthorpe, with intent to defraud Messrs. Smith, Payne, and Smiths, bankers. The female prisoner was possessed of extremely good education, and was a governess to several families, and had, by her talents and means, Lady Nelthorpe's confidence, and kindly invited her on many occasions to her house, and while there the prisoner had seen her write cheques on her bankers. About a month since it was discovered that three cheques, to the amount of £600, had been drawn in Lady Nelthorpe's account, and as they were forgeries, a strict inquiry was made, and it was discovered that the female prisoner had committed them; that she had gone to live with the male prisoner, at Bermondsey New Town, Pimlico, and that they resided together as man and wife on the money till they were both arrested. Mr. Bush, Secretary to the Bankers' Protection Society, attended for the prosecution, and Mr. Montague Chambers for the male prisoner. For the latter it was endeavoured to be proved that he was perfectly unaware of how the female had come by the money; that he had, in the inexperience of youth, contracted a love for her which knew no bounds; and that she had told him she had an annuity of £200 per annum, which he fully believed. He was of a high family—had two brothers in the army—and was implicated in the charges made against him.—Mr. Jardine considered that there was no charge against him to warrant his detention for forgery; but, in case anything further should be forthcoming, he should require heavy bail for his appearance. The bail was fixed for himself in £1000, and two sureties in £500 each. The bail was immediately found. The female prisoner was committed for trial for forgery, and bail refused, although she was near her confinement. She went into hysterics, screamed loudly in court, and fainted away during the proceedings.

THEIR MAJESTIES THE KING AND QUEEN OF SWEDEN AND NORWAY.

By the courtesy of his Excellency the Swedish Minister, we are enabled to present to our subscribers the accompanying portraits; that of Oscar, King of Sweden and Norway, being copied from a painting by a Swedish artist; and that of the Queen, Josephine, from a lithograph, a striking likeness.

Oscar was born in Paris, in July, 1799, consequently, he will shortly complete his 45th year.

At the time of his birth, his father was commanding the army of reserve on the Rhine, and was, in the same year, appointed Minister of War. His mother was Desirée Clary, the sister of Joseph Buonaparte's wife. In 1796, Napoleon had been a suitor for this lady's hand. In one of his letters, he said, "I will insure to you a brilliant lot. Possibly, I may pass away like a meteor; but I venture to predict that my passage will be long remembered." Mademoiselle de Clary's father, a rich merchant at Marseilles, refused Napoleon, (then General-in-Chief of the army in Italy), observing, that he thought one Buonaparte enough in his family.

In 1804, Oscar, then five years of age, joined his father, who was governor of the kingdom of Hanover. He was placed at a school, where the sons of some of the best families in the country were his companions. His education took a German rather than a French direction, and he imbibed that taste for the literature and the languages of the north which he has constantly retained. Oscar came to Sweden with his father in 1810, since which time he has scarcely ever quitted the country. He has so identified himself with Sweden, that he seldom speaks any other language than the Swedish; and he writes it with a degree of purity, of which several of his printed works bear evidence. Immediately on his arrival in Sweden the education of the young Prince was consigned exclusively to Swedish masters. The good fruits of that education are manifested in his solid and extensive information, and his truly national spirit.

Prince Oscar accompanied his father in the campaign in Norway in the year 1814, and thereby acquired some experience in warlike operations. He has a taste for the military art, though he is not exclusively devoted to it. He can manœuvre with admirable skill a corps of infantry or cavalry, or both together. His knowledge of artillery is extensive, and perfectly practical. He was therefore appropriately created Grand Master of the Artillery of the two kingdoms (Master General of the Ordnance).

The variety of his tastes for different branches of military science has not prevented him from making very extensive acquisitions in several other departments of knowledge, particularly in philology and geography. Having been the pupil of Berzelius, so great is his knowledge of chymistry that Sir Humphry Davy declared he never saw so much in an unprofessional person. He is the author of several works on military subjects; and of a work on Prison Discipline, which has been translated into English, and almost every other European language. King Oscar is a munificent patron of the fine arts, has great talent for drawing, and is an excellent musician. The King expresses himself in public speaking with elegance and facility, and he has manifested extraordinary talent in translating rapidly into Swedish or Norwegian the speeches which his father used to extemporise in French.

His countenance is handsome, his features regular, his figure noble and well proportioned, and his look is full of amenity. His manner displays more of the calmness of a native of the north than the vivacity which might be expected in one of French extraction. He well discharged all his high state duties as Prince Royal; at four different times, owing to the King's ill-health, he had in his hands the government of the kingdom of Sweden, and he was long Viceroy of Norway. He has, moreover, exercised the functions of Chancellor of the Universities of Upsala, Lund, and Christiania, of High Admiral, and, as we have already said, of Commander of the Artillery.

He married, twenty years ago, Josephine, the daughter of Eugene Beauharnois, Duke of Leuchtenberg (one of the great characters of our age), by a Princess of Bavaria, sister of the present King. Four sons and one daughter are the issue of this marriage.

The succession to the throne is the more firmly secured to his family by the descent of his sons from their grandmother, the Princess of Bavaria; a descent which brings them nearer to the ancient house of Vasa than the Prince is who takes that name, and who really is only Prince of Holstein Gottorp.

All parties in Sweden and Norway hail the accession of Oscar to the throne with joy; although the place of his renowned father is difficult to fill. Most of the great powers of Europe have sent persons of high rank to congratulate Oscar on his accession; and the Emperor of Russia, immediately upon receiving the news of the demise of the late King, sent his own son-in-law, (brother to the Queen of Sweden,) to Stockholm, to express his deep regret at the death of so great and good a King, and to assure Oscar of his sincere friendship and esteem.

The funeral of the late King has been appointed to take place with great pomp, on the 26th inst. The day of the coronation of King Oscar is stated to be fixed in July.

The Royal Palace at Stockholm, of which we annex a picturesque engraving, is as fine a regal edifice as any in Europe; and has a truly majestic appearance from whatever quarter you behold it. It forms an immense quadrangle, the sides of which front the four chief points of the compass. The northern and southern faces are prolonged towards the sea, and the space thus formed between the palace walls and the railing, connecting the two projecting wings, is filled with flowers and shrubs; and this small garden, rising thus close above the quay, has a very pleasing effect. But, by far the finest view of the palace is either from the water, where it rises proudly above you, displaying its vast dimensions with a most imposing effect; or from the opposite side of the harbour, where you take in the bridge and the fine buildings of the square of Gustavus Adolphus.

No capital in Europe possesses greater advantages in point of situation than Stockholm; and but few can compete with the Swedish metropolis in the imposing beauty of her first appearance, when approached from the Baltic. On the seaward side the Royal Palace, rising almost from the water's edge, crowns, with its massive and spacious buildings, the only elevated spot of ground on the central island of the city; while the lofty tower of the adjoining church appears to spring from within the palace-walls.

The palace is not a century old, having been completed in the year 1755, under the superintendence of Count Tessin, the son of the original architect, whose labours, when fast advancing to completion, were destroyed by fire, in the year 1697. It contains a museum, library, and galleries of pictures and sculpture; and in the private apartments are a few fine paintings, by Rembrandt, Vandyke and Rubens.

THE ROYAL PALACE, STOCKHOLM.

It would appear that impressions of the cuts contained in the first edition of the "Dance of Death," had been printed off, in the manner of press proofs, on one side of the paper only, for some time before they appeared in a volume; and it has been conjectured that they were first printed in this manner at Basle, about 1530. A set of those impressions—one only, of the cut of the Astrologer, being wanting—is still preserved in the public library at Basle. A similar set, of the same cuts, belonged to the late William Young Ottley, and was sold, at the sale of his engravings, in 1837, to the British Museum, for £37 10s.

The original cuts have the appearance of having been printed with the greatest care. From the lightness of the impression in certain places, where the lines seem gradually to vanish, it is evident that the blocks had been lowered in those places, in order to diminish the pressure.

It has been supposed that the practice of lowering was of but recent introduction; it is, however, evident from many wood-cuts, even of an earlier date than those of the "Dance of Death," that the practice was well understood by the old wood-engravers.

In the same year, 1538, that the "Dance of Death" was first printed at Lyons, another book containing illustrations of the Old Testament, engraved on wood from Holbein's designs, was also published at the same place and by the same publishers. The first four cuts are the same as the first four of the "Dance of Death," being printed, in fact, from the same blocks. The rest of the cuts contained in the book, amounting to eighty-six, are of very unequal merit—some displaying great beauty of design and neatness of execution, while others appear to have been carelessly drawn and coarsely engraved. Though they they are decidedly inferior to the cuts of the "Dance of Death," yet the hand and mannerisms of the same designer may be frequently perceived in them. Several editions of the Bible Cuts were subsequently published at Lyons; one of them, of the date of 1549, has the explanatory text in English.

It has frequently been asserted that the cuts of the "Dance of Death" were engraved by Holbein himself; but there is not the slightest ground for the supposition. If he were an engraver on wood as well as a painter and designer, and had actually engraved those cuts, it is most likely that he himself would have engraved some of the designs which he made in England, where, in his time, there were no good engravers on wood, and, perhaps, no one who devoted himself exclusively to the profession. The cuts contained in Archbishop Cranmer's Catechism, printed at London, 1548, have been ascribed to Holbein; and two of them are unquestionably of his designing, for one of them contains his name at full length, and the other his initials, H. H. The rest, twenty seven in number, whether designed by Holbein or not, appear to have been more feebly drawn than the other two, and display none of Holbein's characteristic vigour. The execution of the whole is that of a very ordinary workman. It is certain that they were not engraved by the person who engraved the cuts of the "Dance of Death," for it is impossible that he could have disguised his hand so completely; and if it be supposed that Holbein himself engraved the two which contain his mark, and if they are to be considered as a fair specimen of his abilities in this respect, it is certain that he did not excel as a wood-engraver. The cuts in Cranmer's Catechism may, however, be considered as the best which had hitherto appeared in any book printed in England. The best wood-cuts to be found in English books printed between 1550 and 1600, are the ornamental borders of title-pages and large initial letters; and though some of them possess considerable merit, yet scarcely one can be pronounced excellent. There appears to have been a want both of talented artists to furnish designs, and of skilful engravers to execute them. One of the most "profusely illustrated" English books of this period, is a work entitled, "A Book of Christian Prayers," but more generally known by the name of Queen Elizabeth's Prayer Book, printed at London, by John Day, 1569. Each page is surrounded by a border formed of wood-cuts, partly ornamental, and partly illustrative of the text. It is stated in Herbert's edition of "Ames's Typographical Antiquities," that such of the cuts as relate to the history of Christ, are "after Albert Durer and his wife." The statement is incorrect: the cuts are not copied from any of Albert Durer's; and there is not the slightest reason for supposing that his wife was accustomed to make drawings, or to engrave on wood. The mark I. C., with a graver between the letters, occurs on several of those cuts, and is probably that of the engraver.

About 1560, Virgil Solis, a native of Nuremberg, appears to have been held in great repute by the German booksellers, as a designer on wood, and to have been much employed by them, not only in this branch of art, but also as a copper-plate engraver. Though many of his cuts display great fertility of invention, they yet generally want the stamp of truth; his figures are deficient in character; and his subjects are more likely the compositions of a dexterous than of a great artist. Bernard Solomon, a French artist, contemporary with Virgil Solis, appears to have been chiefly employed by the Lyons booksellers. He is said to have been an engraver on wood as well as a designer. The cuts ascribed to him are generally remarkable for their slim, meagre figures, and the comparative delicacy of their execution. Both he and Solis are justly classed with the little masters.

One of the best professional designers on wood in Germany, between 1560 and 1590, was Jost Amman, a native of Zurich, but who removed to Nuremberg, about 1560. His cuts display much more spirit and vigour than those of Virgil Solis; and they are also generally better engraved. The best of Jost Amman's numerous cuts, are contained in the following works:—"A Description of all Ranks Arts, and Trades," in German verse, by Hans Sachs, first printed at Frankfort, in quarto, 1564, and several times reprinted in a smaller form, with the descriptions in Latin, by Hartman Schopper; among the cuts is one of a wood engraver. Three books of costume, published between 1580 and 1585; and a work on Hunting and Fowling, published in 1582. From the time of Jost Amman, who died in 1591, wood-engraving appears to have rapidly declined in Germany. In new books of a superior class, copper-plate engravings now began to supersede wood-cuts, and the latter became chiefly confined to books of comparatively low price and inferior character. Artists of talent, not meeting with encouragement, no longer applied themselves to designing on wood; and the art of wood-engraving being thus left to mere workmen, had, by the end of the sixteenth century, sunk into neglect with respect to the higher purposes of book-illustration. The publication of the celebrated "Collection of Voyages and Travels," with copper-plate engravings, by the brothers De Bry and others, which was first commenced at Frankfort, about 1590, may be considered as distinctly marking the period when copper-plate engravings began to supersede wood-cuts in books.

Some of the best wood-engravings which appeared towards the end of the sixteenth century are from the designs of Henry Goltzius, a Flemish artist; and several of the largest, printed in chiaro-scuro, are said to have been engraved by himself. In 1590 there was published at Venice a book of costumes, ancient and modern, of various parts of the world, with upwards of three hundred cuts, drawn by Cesare Vecellio, a relation of Titian. Those cuts, which display much character, have the appearance of having been drawn in a free and spirited manner with pen and ink. About this period, and indeed for twenty years previously, the wood-engravers of France and Italy appear to have been principally employed in executing ornamental vignettes and borders, and in engraving illustrative cuts for books of emblems and devices.

THE DECLINE OF WOOD-ENGRAVING IN THE SEVENTEENTH CENTURY; ITS REVIVAL IN THE EIGHTEENTH; AND ITS SUBSEQUENT EXTENSION.

Scarcely a single artist of reputation is known as a designer on wood in the sixteenth century. Rubens, indeed, made a few large drawings on wood; but, as they were printed for himself, it would seem that they were made rather as an experiment for his own satisfaction than for general circulation. It is not unlikely that he wished to compare his own designs engraved on wood with those of the older German masters, of whose works, executed in this manner, he is known to have been an admirer. From his having made so few it is not unreasonable to suppose that he was not satisfied with the experiment. The best of those cuts is a woodland scene, in which the Virgin and infant Christ, with three infantine figures, are introduced in the foreground. In all of them the mere mechanism of the execution is too obtrusively apparent to entitle them to high praise as wood-engravings. Those impressions which have a tint of sepia printed over them, appear much better, in consequence of having the harshness of the lines subdued, than those which are printed simply on white paper. Those cuts were engraved by Christopher Jegher, who, having been presented with the blocks by Rubens, subsequently published them on his own account. Jegher resided at Antwerp, but is said to have been born in Germany, about 1578. Cornelius Van Sichem, a native of Holland, and a contemporary of Jegher, executed, generally in a dry hard manner, an immense number of wood-engravings, most of which appear to be bad copies from the cuts of Albert Durer, and other old masters of the German school. In this period very few books are to be found, which derive any additional value from the excellence of the wood-cuts which they contain. Wood-engraving, for the purpose of book-illustration, had now fallen far behind engraving on copper.

A wood-engraver of the name of Switzer, probably a foreigner, executed the cuts for Speed's "History of Britain," printed in 1611, and is landed in the preface as "the most exquisite and curious hand of that age." Even admitting the compliment to be true, the inevitable consequence is, that the best wood-engraver of the age was a very poor workman. Switzer also engraved the cuts in Parkinson's "Herbal," 1629. Switzer had a son who was also a wood-engraver, and who is mentioned in the first edition of Evelyn's "Sculptura," 1662, as being then living, and following his profession.

THE ST. ANN'S SOCIETY SCHOOLS.—On Wednesday last the anniversary feat val of this most excellent institution, which was established for the purpose of providing education, clothing, and entire maintenance for the children of those who had been once in pecuniary circumstances, whether orphans or not, and belonging to all parts of the world, was held at the London Tavern, in Bishopsgate-street. Lord Ashley, M.P., in the chair. The noble chairman was supported by the Sheriffs, Dr. Croly, Dr. Richardson, and several other dignitaries belonging to the Established Church. This charity was instituted in the year 1709 and the truly Christian object which its promoters, under the blessing of Divine Providence, have more than a century so munificently and usefully carried out has secured to the society the patronage of her Most Gracious Majesty, her Majesty the Queen Dowager, his Royal Highness Prince Albert, his Majesty the King of Denmark, his Majesty the King of the Belgians, her Royal Highness the Duchess of Gloucester, her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, K.G., &c. The customary loyal toasts having been given and responded to with great enthusiasm, the children were introduced, and the appearance of both girls and boys, as they were marshalled into the room, was such as to elicit the warmest approbation. The noble Chairman, in his usual eloquent and impressive manner, gave "Prosperity to the St. Ann's Society, and may the present objects of this charity become its future support." The peculiar character of this charity cannot fail to secure it at all times the most lively sympathy and aid of a Christian public. Since the establishment of the society, upwards of 1000 boys and 600 girls have been placed out or apprenticed. Dr. Croly proposed the health of the noble chairman, as the great philanthropist of the age, as the man sagacious in measures to remedy and relieve public distress. The reverend gentleman dwelt on the amiable and Christian virtues of the noble chairman in terms which we regret want of space compels us to omit. Lord Ashley returned thanks in a speech marked with delicacy and good feeling, and took occasion to advert to the case of the children engaged in factories, &c., at the same time suggesting that the present time was that which must be taken advantage of to secure to the younger branches of the working classes that protection and those blessings which God and nature demanded should be extended to them. Various other toasts followed, and the festivities were kept up to a late hour. The subscriptions amounted to £651 4s.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

DEATH OF VICE-ADMIRAL SIR JAHLEEL BRENTON.

The gallant Sir Jahleel Brenton, K.C.B., Vice-Admiral and Lieutenant Governor of Greenwich Hospital, died at Leamington Spa, on Sunday.

Sir Jahleel Brenton was born in 1770, and made a lieutenant on the 22nd November, 1790, and as such served on board the Barfleur in Lord Bridport's action off Cape St. Vincent's, in 1797 (in which were also his gallant friends, two of the admirals of the name of Admiral Admiralty); was made commander on the 3rd July, 1799; and in command of the Speedy, 14-gun brig, in that year fought several gallant actions in the vicinity of Gibraltar; three of the enemy's vessels he captured during this command near Cape de Gatt, under a heavy fire of musketry from the surrounding hills. In the following month of October he destroyed four of the enemy's vessels in a heavy surf, at the time exposed to the guns of a fortification and musketry from the beach, and in the next month of November he displayed consummate skill and gallantry in beating off two Spanish schooners, and ten other armed vessels; by these services he won his post rank, which he dated 25th April, 1800. He was then selected by Sir James (afterwards Lord) de Saumarez as his flag captain, and in command of the Cæsar, distinguished himself in the severe action off Algesiras, of 6th July, 1801. Subsequently, in command of the Minerva, when that frigate got aground in a fog and was lost near Cherbourg, he defended her during a heavy fire of several hours, for which unsurpassable gallantry he received the highest praise when acquitted at a court-martial held on board his ship.

In 1807, when in command of the Spartan frigate, Sir Jahleel assisted in driving the French garrison out of Pesaro and destroying the castle; in the following month assisted in blowing up the castle of Cesaratico, destroying a neighbouring battery, and compelling the island of Sussilh to surrender; assisted at the reduction of Zante and Cephalonia, and particularly distinguished himself at the capture of Cerigo, which island he then commanded. These and many other important services did this gallant officer render in the Adriatic. In the same ship in 1810, in concert with the Success, he fought a most gallant action with and defeated a French squadron in the bay of Naples, by which service he was severely wounded. The gallant deceased was created a baronet on the occasion, and received other honours, and on the 8th February, 1811, had a pension conferred on him of £300 per annum for the wounds he had received. He obtained his flag promotion as rear-admiral on the 22d July, 1830, and as vice admiral 1st July, 1840, and subsequently had another pension conferred upon him of £300 per annum for good services he had rendered, in addition to that granted by Parliament.

The gallant deceased was the son of the late Rear Admiral Brenton. He was twice married. His eldest son, Mr. Launcelot Charles Lee Brenton, who succeeds to the baronetcy, was born in 1807.

Admiral Sir Davidge Gould, G.C.B., one of Nelson's companions on the glorious victory of the Nile, is staying at the Clarendon Hotel with Lady Gould. The gallant admiral is in the enjoyment of excellent health.

HER MAJESTY'S 44TH REGIMENT.—On Monday last very considerable interest was excited in Hounslow barracks, owing to the arrival of a detachment of this regiment, consisting of 1 sergeant-major, 1 serjeant, and 18 privates, under the command of Captain W. Evans, being the released prisoners who had been taken at Cabul in 1841-2, and who, after a captivity of nearly two years, were liberated by the British forces in the late war. These troops embarked at Calcutta on the 4th of December last on board the ship the Duke of Cornwall, Captain Eyles, and after a very favourable passage of 128 days, arrived off Gravesend on Saturday afternoon, the 20th instant. The whole of the men are wounded. Two of them have balls in their bodies, causing them at intervals very considerable pain. Two women and one child, with a private of the 49th, and one private of the 3d Dragoon Guards, came with them. The 44th lost one man the second day after they had sailed, who died of cholera. Dr. Fleming, from one of the native corps, had the above soldiers in charge. The troops were under the command of Major-General G. Pollock, C.B., and were released in the month of September, 1842, and miraculously escaped being again taken prisoners during their march through the Khyber Pass to Peshawur, in consequence of the fortunate advance of our troops, which had been expressly forwarded for their safety by Major-General Sir Robert Sale. The men state that no one can imagine the hardships they have endured during the last period of their military career. The majority of these soldiers have been in India upwards of 18 years. They have joined the military invalid depôt at Brompton, and will shortly undergo medical inspection, previous to their being pensioned.

The St. Vincent, 120, flag-ship at Portsmouth, is to be ready to go to Spithead on the 10th of next month. She has for the last three weeks been occasionally exercising her men in their boats with the long guns and small arms, on which occasion Captain F. Rowley has himself directed the exercises.

CHATHAM DOCKYARD.—The Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty have gratefully acknowledged the 57 years' service of Mr. Michael Austin, outer rigger of the dockyard, by allowing him to retire on a pension of £193 per annum, being £47 for his services as a warrant officer, and £146 for his civil services. This receipt of two pensions, in addition to the above, his pension of £16 per annum, granted for the loss of an arm.

SERIOUS ACCIDENT TO DR. AND MRS. WARREN.—On Tuesday afternoon, as Dr. and Mrs. Warren, of No. 128, Aye, Piccadilly, were driving in their pony phaeton over the new road, the ponies from some cause took fright, and ran down Star-hill, Rochester, when, in turning on a road leading to Troy Town, we regret to say the doctor and lady were thrown out of the carriage. Mrs. Warden was not much injured, but her husband has received some injuries, which, it is feared, will prove rather serious.

The Right Hon. the Earl of Haddington, on being made acquainted with the decease of Sir J. Brenton, and the consequent reversion of the good-service pension of £300 per annum, immediately marked the approbation of the Admiralty and the country, in the manner in which it is customary in China of the gallant Commander-in-Chief Vice Admiral Sir W. Parker, G.C.B., by conferring it on that distinguished officer.

SHIPPING INTELLIGENCE.

LOSS OF THE JOHN DENNISTON, OF LIVERPOOL.—MOBILE, March 19, 1844.—My Lord,—I have the horrible misfortune, very foolishly, that the British barque, John Denniston, Young, master, from Liverpool to Mobile, ran ashore near Cape St. Antonio (Cuba), and is a total loss. The master arrived at Key West on the 12th instant, with twelve of the crew. The mate and three of the crew had left the wreck, in a boat, for the Havannah, and have not since been heard of. I have, &c. (Signed, CHARLES FITZGERALD. Earl Aberdeen, K.T., &c. &c. &c.

COUNTRY NEWS.

DERBYSHIRE.—HORRIBLE MURDER AND SUICIDE AT BELPER.—Between one and two o'clock after noon on Monday last, the inhabitants of Belper were thrown into a state of excitement by the announcement that a mechanic named Yeomans, for some time past employed at Messrs. Stott's mills, had murdered his wife, and afterwards cut his own throat. Yeomans was a married man, somewhere turned fifty, and had a family, the eldest son being married. It appears that for some time past matters in his wife have not lived happily together, the cause being a suspicion of the wife's infidelity. During the past week they were known to have quarrelled repeatedly, but on Saturday a neighbour succeeded, as it was thought, in restoring both parties a better understanding. On Monday morning he called at a joiner's shop, and requested permission to sharpen a pocket-knife and a common table-knife, and, having done so, went away. About half-past one o'clock, the next-door neighbour heard a knocking against the wall, and a terrific scream, and on proceeding to the door found that it was locked. An alarm was given, and a blacksmith opened the door, when a most revolting spectacle presented itself. In one part of the lower room, her head resting upon a chair, lay the body of Mrs. Yeomans, apparently lifeless. About a yard from her lay her husband, weltering in blood, his throat dreadfully cut. On further inspection it was found that neither party was dead, and two surgeons were immediately called in; but Yeomans gasped his last immediately afterwards. The skull of the unfortunate woman was most shockingly beaten in, and she died the following day, having never remained senseless during the interval. On the floor near to where the body of Yeomans lay, a pocket-knife and a common table-knife, both covered with blood, were found. The supposition is, that after, as he thought, killing his wife, he cut his throat with the pen-knife blade, but not succeeding, he then used the table-knife. During the afternoon and evening, thousands of people congregated about the house, and the excitement still prevails in the town.

EXETER.—The nomination of candidates for this city took place on Saturday last, when Sir William Follett (the newly-appointed Attorney-General), was proposed by the Mayor (Henry Hooper, Esq.), who was seconded by Joseph Harris, Esq.; and General Briggs, his opponent, was proposed by Mr. Maunder, seconded by Mr. Beasley. R. S. Follett, Esq., advocated the claims of his learned brother, who had always been a consistent Conservative, and Sir Thomas Acland; and General Briggs, for himself, made a public profession of his political creed. The gallant general, being a nominee of the Anti-Corn-law League, of course, declared himself a Free-trader to the full extent of that creed. The show of hands being declared to be in favour of Sir W. Follett, a poll was demanded on behalf of General Briggs, which the High Sheriff fixed to commence at eight o'clock this morning (Monday), when the contest will terminate. The proceedings, we are informed, were conducted throughout in the most quiet manner, and continued so throughout the day, although, as we stated last week, no doubt whatever could be entertained from the commencement of the result of the contest. At one o'clock the poll closed, and it was past four the High Sheriff attended at the Guildhall, which was densely crowded, and declared the state of the poll to be for—Sir W. W. Follett, 1293; Major-General Briggs, 1109; majority for Sir W. Follett, 184. In the course of the day Sir W. W. Follett duly elected as a citizen to serve in this present Parliament for the city and county of the city and borough of Exeter.

HUNTINGDON.—Lord Sandon has retired and withdrawn from the contest on this borough, Thomas Baring, Esq. (late candidate for the city of London), was, on Monday, elected without opposition.

STOCKBRIDGE.—A WOMAN KILLED BY HER HUSBAND.—Considerable excitement prevailed in Biren-street, Hill-gate, Stockport, on Sunday afternoon, from the circumstance of a woman having been killed by her husband, about one o'clock at noon of the same day. The name of the unfortunate woman is Harriet Parrot, and the husband, James Parrot, who has been the cause of her death, was by trade a brickcutter. Parrot and deceased frequently quarrelled, and on Sunday noon, whilst quarrelling, he knocked her down, and then gave her a severe kick on the right side of the neck, about an inch and a half below the ear, which immediately caused her death. Parrot, on seeing the deed he had perpetrated, decamped, but was apprehended in the course of the afternoon.

WOODSTOCK.—On Monday, the nomination took place in the Town Hall, in this borough. No popular excitement appeared to prevail, and until within ten minutes of the appointed hour, the town was as quiet as if an elect on were not thought of. Shortly before ten a cavalcade entered Woodstock from Blenheim Park, consisting of about two hundred sturdy labourers, walking arm in arm, and headed by a band and banners. The labourers had all got their breakfasts at Blenheim. So complete was the Marquis of Blandford's conviction of success, that he had no committee, and did not go to the expense of a single flag; those which his followers exhibited had done duty at the last election in the service of Mr. Theiger. After paraading the streets, the Marlborough retainers obtained admission into the Town Hall, and took possession of the best place there. This done, the public were permitted to enter. The Marquis of Blandford then appeared, and took his seat on the right of the returning officer's seat, shortly after, Mr. Humfrey the other candidate, accompanied by the recorder, Rector, Town Clerk, and a few others, entered, and took their places on the left of the chair. Alderman Morris proposed, and T. Robinson, Esq., (a banker at Oxford) seconded the Marquis of Blandford, and did not go to the expense of a single person to represent his borough in Parliament. The latter gentleman bore testimony to the faithfulness with which they had been served by Mr. Theiger, and stated that although (Mr. R.) might have been ill-treated by the Duke of Marlborough, it would be paltry on his part to show his resentment by opposing the Marquis of Blandford.—Dr. Rowles, the Rector, and Mr. North, the Town Clerk, nominated L. Humfrey, Esq. barrister-at-law.—The Marquis of Blandford having spoken, Mr. Humfrey next addressed the electors. After returning thanks, and complimenting the noble lord on the sparks of talent he had shown, and the great honour he had done himself by a speech unequalled by any first appearance he had ever witnessed—(cheers)—he said, "I do not come here out of any personal opposition to the noble lord, but actuated by a sense of duty. I do not come here as the son of the Duke of Marlborough, if he seeks to avail himself of the wealth and influence conferred by the house of Blenheim, he must take the burden also. I assure you I never could have come here as the son of landed property, without personal inquiries, that in the annals of history never was a borough so neglected, a tenantry so oppressed, the poor so utterly forgotten, the sick and destitute so totally unprovided for as in Woodstock. (Cheers.) Here is the Duke of Marlborough enjoying all the privileges of his wealth and rank without doing the slightest good in return. I came here because I received a requisition numerously signed by some others by my landlord's request—(laughter)—supported by the Recorder, whom the hired servants of the duke will not permit to be heard in his own borough—(cheers), by the Town Clerk, by Alderman Wilks, and several others. If the Duke of Marlborough had his canvass before he arrived in Woodstock, and thanking it would be difficult for him to win, he would not expose his friends to the vengeance of a man like the Duke of Marlborough. Great good had been done already, and he hoped still would be done by this election, and that the Duke of Marlborough would become a better landlord, a kinder friend, a visitor of the sick, and a reliever of the necessitous, and, in words which he hoped he was not using without reverence, he hoped they would all become one fold under one shepherd. God bless you all. (Loud and long-continued cheering.)—Mr. Walesby addressed the meeting at some length in a similar strain to Mr. Humfrey.—The Deputy Mayor then declared the Marquis of Blandford duly elected. (Loud cheers.)—The Marquis of Blandford returned thanks, promising to do everything he could for the borough. He had heard a great many things that had pained him exceedingly, and he regretted his father as being a peer, was prevented from being present to answer the charges that had been brought against him. He was a kind-hearted man, but, like others in his situation, was surrounded by dependents, who had acted so as to make him unpopular. He (the marquis) had no personal knowledge of the facts, and was not answerable for the acts of his father. He would, however, do the best he could to assist the borough. He would mix among their families, and, as a magistrate, redress their grievances. He hoped the prosperity which had hovered over Woodstock would now descend upon it, and his best abilities and exertions should be used at their command. (Loud cheers.) The noble marquis was then chaired round the town, seated in a carriage drawn by four horses, and preceded by a procession of banners and flags, with a band of music.

The Standard gives the following explanation of Mr. Frederick Theiger's retirement from the representation of Woodstock:—"We state from authority that the following are the correct circumstances of Mr. Theaiger's connexion with the borough of Woodstock:—Upon the accession of the present Duke of Marlborough to the title mt 840, his grace, unsolicited, and of his own free will, tendered to the hon. gentleman his interest in the borough, with a promise of undisturbed possession until the Marquis of Blandford should attain his majority. The Marquis of Blandford came of age some 11 months ago, notwithstanding which Mr. Theaiger has never been called upon to fulfil his engagements. The recurring occasion has given the hon. gentleman's appointment to the office of Solicitor-General, the Marquis of Blandford naturally offers himself to fill the seat; and such proceedings, therefore, ought neither to have been unexpected by, nor a surprise and disappointment to, her Majesty's Government, or the hon. gentleman himself."

NEWMARKET FIRST SPRING MEETING.

WEDNESDAY NIGHT, 12 o'clock.—The prizes awarded from the heath contained all the particulars that a very insignificant day's sport was worthy of; it also gave an intimation of the great improvement of Bay Momus in the Derby Betting, and of the decrease of Lanercost to 40 to 1; the evening betting made no alteration in the odds against the first, but gave the other another lift. Orlando was also in force, the offers against him, after several bets at 25 to 1, having dropped five points. Cossack was to take 5 lb from Satrap, and 9 to 2 about The Ugly Buck, but no business done. 1000 to 20 was taken about Loadstone, and 1000 to 15, twelve times at least, about Lord G. Bentinck's lot. In most other respects the odds, which are taken at midnight, agree with those quoted in our last.

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE.—Since Monday, only a moderate arrival of English wheat has taken place up to our market. Fine qualities mostly found buyers, at full prices, but in other kinds very little was doing. Foreign wheat—both free and in bond—met with very dull sale, at barely late rates. Nearly the whole of the late arrivals of foreign barley have been taken in by the distillers, at decline of 1s. per quarter. The malt trade was steady at full currencies. Oats were quite as dear, and sales to the small supplies. Beans, peas, and flour, as on Monday.

Bread.—The prices of wheaten bread in the metropolis are from 8d to 8½d of household ditto 6d to 7½d per 8lb loaf.

Tea.—During the present week the demand for most kinds of tea has been active at very full prices—to-day a good second congou having sold at 1s 9d to 2s 0d; good congou, 1s 1d to 1s 2½d; twankay, ordinary, is 2½d to 1s 3d, and common hyson, 2s 3d to 2s 6d per lb. For sale on the 1st proximo 3,100 packages have been declared.

Sugar.—This market has again ruled steady, at full prices. The sales for the week have been about 1,700 hds. and tierces, on the following terms. Brown, 63s to 65s; low yellow, 66s to 68s; middling, 68s 6d to 69s 6d; and good to fine 69s to 70s per cwt. The accounts received from the West Indies are favourable as regards the sugar crops. Throughout the sales the bidding was very spirited Provisions.—We have not the slightest improvement to notice in the demand for Irish butter, and prices are next to nominal. Foreign butter is a dull sale, and somewhat lower. Bacon and most other kinds of provisions have a downward tendency.

Tallow.—The market is in a heavy state, for P.Y.C., on the spot, at 40s 6d to 40s 9d; but, for forward delivery, a fair business is doing at 41s to 41s 3d per cwt.

Hops.—Although there has been rather more business doing in this market, since our last report, not the slightest altera tion has taken place in the value of any kind of hops:—Weald of Kent pockets, 4l5 to 6l 10s, Mid Kent ditto, 4l 12s to 6l 10s; East Kent ditto, 4l 15s to 6l; Bitter ditto, 4l 10 to 6l 11s; Sussex, 4l to 6l 10s; Farnham 4l 15s to 6l 11s 10s, Mid Kent, huge, 6l 10s to 8l 8s.

COMMERCE AND MONEY.

The Money Markets, during this week, have not undergone any material alteration, nor is any great change looked for in the value of any description of British public securities, until the 10th of May, when the renewal of the charter which the Bank of England enjoys for the renewed, be promulgated. In our colonial and foreign commerce one reports exceed our im[illegible] reports, and upward for sale on the Royal Exchange was again urged to our foreign bankers required, and the rates of the foreign exchanges were consequently fairly supported, rendering a further importation of the precious metals unnecessary. The bullion market remained a matter of absolute necessity

Money consequently continues to be abundantly unemployed, and the attent on of capitalists has been again directed to the shares of public associations, more particularly to those of railways, in many descriptions of which investments to a considerable amount have been negotiated. [illegible] Manchester, Birmingham, and Liverpool, and other extensive undertakings in the Chester and Holyhead Lancaster and Carlisle, and in the North Britain, [illegible] The present [illegible] been freely submitted to by the purchasers in the course of this week. In the [illegible] bond lines also there is a disposition to come forward more freely in them, and the late decline in particular, which occurred in the value of the shares of the London and Birmingham has been in part recovered. Those of the Eastern Counties are in demand at rather improving prices, and so likewise are those of the Edinburgh and Glasgow, and of the Newcastle and Darlington Junction This department of the money market is gradually attracting more and more of the public attention as a channel for safe and liberal dividends may be obtained eventually for money sunk in it, even at present prices

On the Foreign Stock Exchange the average amount of business has been again transacted. For various descriptions of foreign securities, the new Spanish Funded and continues, and purchases to some extent have been agn s effected. Russian Bonds have been sold at 107½ to 108, and Austrian, at 101½ to 102 Dividend Warrants, however, remain displayed, at one time by the Bulls, and at another by the Bears. No actual legitimate business, however, has been done in them. Capital but to no great extent has been employed in Greek Bonds at Belgian, Colombian, and in Greek Bonds at their late sales. Of those of Buenos Ayres and Peru purchases to some extent have been made. Mexican 5 cds would likewise partake in the almost general improvement, did the agents of that state act towards their public creditors with even common civility. That, however, is not thought to be the case amongst the dealers in those bonds on the Stock Exchange

THE COAL TRADE AND MINERS OF NORTHUMBERLAND AND DURHAM.

COAL.—The counties of Northumberland and Durham are richer in the article of coal than any other portion of the British Isles; and, being unrivalled in quality and quantity, render this portion of our country's produce all-important to the manufacturing, naval, and steam establishments of this as well as foreign kingdoms. The coal seams of this district lay in the form of a basin, or trough, extending in length about sixty miles, and in breadth about twenty-five. In some parts it protrudes to the surface of the earth, and has been found unbowelled at the depth of 964 feet, but, as yet, has not been worked at a greater depth than 822 feet. When found, the strata of coal vary in thickness from six inches to six feet six inches, some of which are not worked, being too thin to afford a remunerating profit. The seams are distinguished by the names which we are accustomed to call various coal, as Wallsend, Hetton, &c. "As all strata," says the intelligent geologist, Whitehurst, "accompanying coal universally abound with vegetable forms, it seems to indicate that all coal were originally derived from the vegetables thus enveloped in the stone or clay."

TRADE.—Some estimate of the value and importance of this British mineral, and the industry and wealth engaged in the business, may be formed when we state, that in those northern counties alone [illegible] 33,000 individuals are employed in the coal works; that upwards of 7000 vessels are engaged in its transit, with a tonnage of about 1,000,000, and a capital stated to be considerably above £9,000,000 In fact, this trade is emphatically denominated "the nursery of British seamen."

During the last month, a deputation of colliery proprietors waited upon Sir Robert Peel to represent the depressed state of the coal trade, and point out the injurious effects of the export duty imposed by his tariff of 1842. They showed the decrease of imports, the ruin of shipbuilding and shipowners, and the discontent and poverty of the classes dependent upon these branches of British industry; that in order to compete with foreign mines which had been brought into operation on account of the export duty, they had reduced their prices of coal from 9s. 6d. to 5s. per ton, and the shipowner had lowered his rate of freight; still having a duty of about 30 per cent. they found they could not compete with the mines of Belgium, Spain, and France. The export of coal in 1843 had suffered a decrease of 1,272,207 tons, although a small increase had taken place in the small coal of 307,887 tons Culm or coke being free of duty, had experienced a rise of about 29,000 tons within the last three years; they therefore prayed the remission of a duty trivial to Government, but seriously injurious to the coal trade.

The Corporation of London appear to have usually considered the article of coal a fitting merchandize upon which to lay a tax to add to their funds; this is particularly evinced by the plea of improving the metropolis by the building of St. Paul's Cathedral was principally paid by such a duty, the Royal Exchange, &c. The present city tax is 4d. per ton; for the coal-market improvements, 1d.; for the new London-bridge operations, 8d.; and it would be seen by the reasons of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS in last week's publication, a meeting has been held at the Crown and Anchor Tavern, to oppose a proposed additional tax on the coal brought to the London market, for the purpose of forming an embankment of the flames for the recreation of the inhabitants of the metropolis, at which a petition was resolved upon which has received numerous signatures. This additional levy of 3d. a ton, and the last-named tax would not cease until the year 1862. Those London duties would be in all 1s. 6d. per ton to add to the consumer's price.

The miners, or pitmen, as they are more generally termed in their local districts, are a peculiar race of men; their isolated position, their subterranean labours, their limited society, the early age at which they are sent down the pits—all tend to give them distinguishing characteristics, great similarity of manners, thought, and dialect. In stature they are small, sallow and thin in countenance, of muscular, and frequently have a particular gait and twist of body, which is contracted from the position they have to submit to in the performance of their labours. At one time they were noted for the gaudiness of their holiday attire, and their fondness for the ring, boyish follies during hours of relaxation; but of latter years the itinerant religious enthusiast, the pinchings of poverty, political lecturers, and cheap publications, have caused them to become a thinking, reading, rational mass of industrious workmen. Whilst living as it were in a state of seclusion, they form strong feelings and attachments, and, therefore, when they combine for any particular purpose, they adhere in a manner unknown among the dockmen having a larger field of observation, or temptations and crested evils presented to lure them. The engagements by which they enter into with their employers—termed binding—is for one year; they receive pay every fortnight, according to the quantity of coal they have sent out of the mine; the week they receive no wages they are then said to be "laid." The period they labour is usually eight hours, commencing at various hours of night or day.

The owners of the mines provide houses and coal for their men; the houses consist mostly of a long row of cottages, one story high, of brick, with slate roofs, and dreary toil, return; be first thoroughly washes himself, and, free from the black dirt and wet of the mine, not having tasted food since his departure, enjoys his substantial meal and home-made bread, and then, with his pipe in mouth, after found in other labouring districts. We feel pain in stating, after the above picture, that from the depression of the coal trade, the consequent partial employment, and the suspicion existing between master and man, many of their usual comforts have been sadly abridged, and that too many have been reduced to wretchedness, poverty, and want. Altogether the coal miners in those districts are a worthy, industrious, and moral race of men, respectful and hospitable to every one, and their sympathies easily worked upon They may be for a time misguided, or have wrong and stubborn ideas, but they merit the attention and kindness of all right thinking men.

THE STRIKE.—An unfortunate circumstance at present exists between the pitmen and the coal owners, as the readers of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS will have perceived stated in former columns, which has led to an extensive strike. For some time the men have been making preparations for this movement, by an organised union, embracing the whole body of miners in England, Scotland, and Wales, and engaged a committee, whom they term their "Attorney-General," to conduct and advise in their affairs. One of the plans adopted by the men has been to guard against working more coal than sufficed for immediate demands, by no stacks ever being on hand. The various bodies in different parts of the kingdom elected delegates representing 51,389 miners, who met at Glasgow, when it was resolved, "That the men of Northumberland and Durham ought, after using every other lawful means, and not yet gaining their end, to be allowed to refuse to work under their master's agreement, which is to take place on the 6th of April." The matter of dispute is rather difficult to understand from ex-parte, interested, and contradictory statements, but, as far as we can unravel the subject, it would appear—

1. The men consider that one year's binding is too long a period, and therefore propose half a year, this the masters refuse, and offer one month's engagement. The men, in reply, affirm as each change of master involves a necessary removal of furniture, &c., they cannot accede.

PITMAN.

2. Not to be compelled to do other branches of the work than that to which they belong, without the an absolute necessity.

3. Wages to be paid weekly, and up to the time of finishing work—not one week in reserve, as at present, and to be valued by weight, not measure.

4. The hours of labour of those acting as auxiliaries to the hewers, not to exceed ten hours.

5. A hewer to have work sufficient to earn 3s. per day for five days per week, or wages to the amount, in default of work; and not to be prevented, as at present, seeking for other work, when there is none at the colliery to which he is bound.

These appear the principal points in dispute. There are minor regulations which the men desire adopted, respecting fines, accidents, and house occupation. The coal proprietors state "the terms of the pitmen's bond are unreasonable, and such as no colliery can comply with;" that the men have had an average wage of 3s. 8d. per day for eight hours work, besides, in most cases, a free house, garden, and coal; that the demand would equal 28 per cent. upon the hewers' prices. Both parties appear determined to hold out, and time only will solve the result. Surely, an amicable arrangement might be come to by a disinterested arbitration. At the last great strike, about 12 years ago, several modifications in the management of the collieries were adopted to the benefit of the men, but they suffered to an extent from which they have hardly yet recovered; many strangers were introduced, a very different class of men, who, however, from necessity continuing the employment, have been a serious injury to the original workmen. The men have district and committee meetings, and on the 8th of April the Northumberland and Durham men, to the number of 20,000, held a public meeting on Black Fell; and on the 15th, the Wear miners, to the number of about 10,000, held a public meeting on Pittington Hill, in the county of Durham. At these meetings they merely reiterate their determination to hold out, and pass the following laudable resolution, agreed upon at a committee meeting of the Miners' Association of Great Britain:—"That in the opinion of this committee, it is incumbent on every member of this association to conduct himself peaceably and orderly; and this committee are further of opinion that any person not conducting himself strictly within the pale of the law is declared an enemy to the best interests of this association."

They have also resolved to petition against the export duties. Coals have slightly risen in price in the northern ports.

The Durham Chronicle calculates that by this strike at least £50 000 per week, that would otherwise have been paid in wages, on the banks of the Tyne, Wear, and Tees, is withheld from circulation.

The Gateshead Observer says, we think our industrious neighbours to be misled by interested advisers; and for their own sakes, as well as for the good of the district, we counsel them to desist from their present unhappy course of conduct.

LAKE TROUT FISHING, IN DERWENTWATER

LAKE TROUT FISHING.

This sport has now fairly commenced, and from the number of "Otters" seen on the lakes, it would appear that this style of fishing has superseded all others; the old system of trolling is abandoned; and, instead of having one or two lines out, the fishing-ground of a lake may now be swept with twenty or thirty flies of munows, by having an "Otter" on each side of the boat; with the advantage of your lines at a right angle from the boat instead of following in its wake. The "Otter" is merely a board of wood, about two feet long, and nine or ten inches broad, and with the cords, iron link, and ring, is shown in the annexed woodcut. The gut lines are attached, at regular intervals, to a strong silk line, one end of which is fastened to the ring and the other to the top of a pole in the boat, in the manner shown in the sketch. As regards the mode of using the "Otter," the angler will learn more with ten minutes' experience than from any description in our columns. The "Otter" may be merely a local designation for this new fishing apparatus; a better one might surely be found. The scene is a part of the lake of Derwentwater, at Keswick, in Cumberland, which, as well as the other lakes, is well stocked with fish, particularly trout, pike, and perch.

CHURCHES OF THE METROPOLIS.—No. XLI.

ST. GEORGE'S, BLOOMSBURY.

This singular structure, situated in Hart-street, Bloomsbury-square, is one of the fifty new churches appointed to be built at the public expense by the Act of Parliament passed in the tenth year of the reign of Queen Anne, it was consecrated in 1731. A district for its parish was taken out of that of St. Giles's-in-the-Fields, and arrangements made for the support of the poor. This church is distinguished from most others by standing north and south: it was designed by Nicholas Hawksmoor, a pupil of Sir Christopher Wren; and the tower and steeple present the only example in the metropolis of being placed by the side of the main edifice, the favourite practice of Palladio. The church is 110 feet in length, 90 in breadth, and about 50 in height; its most admired feature is the magnificent portico of eight Corinthian columns, which Hawksmoor is said to have added to the original plan, in consequence of the admiration excited by Gibbs's portico to St. Martin's-in-the-Fields, then just completed. Hawksmoor, in some points, improved upon Gibbs's design; it displays itself, for instance, better, from the height to which it is raised above the level of the street; though it is considered, by some, inferior in point of execution.

ST. GEORGE'S, BLOOMSBURY.

Walpole calls the steeple a masterpiece of absurdity, whilst others prefer it to any steeple in the Metropolis, on the ground of its originality, picturesque form, and expressiveness. Upon the tower, which impresses you with its majestic simplicity, rises a range of unattached Corinthian columns and pediments, extending round the four sides of the steeple, with a kind of double base, ornamented in the lower division with a round hole on each side, and a curious little projecting arch at each angle. Above this stage commences a series of steps, gradually narrowing, so as to assume a pyramidal appearance, the lowest being ornamented at the corners by lions and unicorns, and supporting at the apex of the steps, on a short column, a statue in Roman costume of George I. "Now, the only expression here apparent to our eye," observes a critic, "is, that the steps do certainly answer, in one way, the not unnatural query of how the king got to so uncommon and (otherwise) unaccountable position." Elsewhere it has been remarked that Hawksmoor has literally made the king the head of the church; and the following epigram has been penned upon the singularity:—

> "When Harry the Eighth left the Pope in the lurch,
> The people of England made him head of the church;
> But, much wiser still, the good Bloomsbury people,
> 'Stead of the head of the church, made him head of the steeple."

SALMON-LEAP.

As the season approaches for fashionable tourists to betake themselves to "fresh fields and pastures new," it becomes a portion of the duty which we owe to our dear public to give a direction to their steps, and lead them to those sunny spots "where friends may dwell" and where anglers idlers, health-seekers, hypochondriacs, geologists, and bon-mots may find sport, amusement, vigour, sanity, objects for study, and, though last not least, appetite, which governs all. The subject of our present sketch is the celebrated "Salmon-leap" on the river Bann, near Coleraine, in the North of Ireland, which is within a few hours' drive of the Giant's Causeway, that extraordinary and fantastic freak of nature, which has so long puzzled the curious and confounded the rock-ites of the learned societies of Europe. On a fine day in summer, the Bann salmon may be seen in thousands disporting themselves in mid air, in sometimes vain, but often successful attempts to surmount the obstacles presented in their stream of life, but, unlike their tyrant tormentors of the human family under similar circumstances, these piscatory mountebanks, undepressed by failure, return again and again to the encounter, with renewed energy and vigour.

We remember once a curious trial taking place at the Lifford assizes, in which the lessee of the salmon fishery at Ballyshannon, (where there is another leap similar to that above represented) was the plaintiff, and the proprietor of a distillery on a bank of the river the defendant. It was alleged that the fish became intoxicated with the wash discharged from the distillery and it was endeavoured to be proved that they attempted the leap in a fit of delirium tremens. The jury, however, were of opinion that real Irish fish could never be injured by anything pertaining to whiskey, and as for foreign fish, why—vermicelli—"Serve them right." The Bann salmon, however, are not Mac ewiters, although their rosy gills belie their professions; but, notwithstanding their sobriety, they have a taste for sport, and, as is well known to tourist anglers, are fond of a species of Irish waggery familiarly known in that land o laughter by the expressive phrase of "taking a rise out of them." The river itself has its source in Lough Neagh, which is said by Moore to bury in its depths "the round towers of other days," and many other far-fadeel glories which we fear have only their existence in the vivid imagination of the poet. One thing, however, is certain—the petrifying power of the water, which turns wood into stone in the short space of seven years. An inveterate angler, who was in the habit of standing up to his knees in the water, had his legs petrified, it is said, to such a degree, that the whole male population of the parish used to resort to him on a Sunday morning to sharpen their razors on his shins. Whether this be true or not, we cannot ourselves vouch, but we know those who would—and the man is said to be still alive. Be that as it may, however, one thing is quite certain, that this extraordinary quality in the water has had no deleterious effect whatever on the salmon, for more delicious fish is not to be had from Fairhead to Kilcrumper. The fishery is at present in the hands of a company, composed of fine, honest, sociable, gentlemanly fellows, who will never refuse a stranger the privilege of dipping his rod in the water; but, on the contrary, will fortify him against the chances of taking cold, by putting in his basket a flask of as delicious Wateraide or Bushmills whiskey as ever delighted the heart of an Irishman.

There are several fine hotels in Coleraine, at the head of which the King's Arms and Davock's (or the Traveller's Home) stand pre-eminent. The latter is truly what its name indicates, and boasts of a host and hostess, who, in point of urbanity, true politeness, and genuine hospitality, have no superiors in the kingdom.

FASHIONS FOR MAY.

DESCRIPTION OF THE FIGURES.

No. 1. A Grecian hair coiffure. A Camelion* silk dress, laced down the front with silk gimp cord, chemisette and sleeves of muslin, with embroidered bands.

No. 2. A drawn silk capote. A cachemire cloak trimmed with black lace.

A poult de soie capote, trimmed with ruches of the same, and ornamented with China asters.

The three days of Longchamps, owing to the propitious weather, were more than usually brilliant: the elegantes were attired in all the novelties of the season. Although long files of equipages were seen in the avenue of the Champs Elysée and the Bois de Boulogne, they did not contain all the fashion of Paris; Herz having collected at his Matinée Musical (morning concert), a portion of the élite of the grande monde, whose toilettes were as remarkable for elegance and novelty as those seen in the green alleys of the Tuileries.

Promenade Dresses are frequently made of camelion tafeta (a silk shot with three colours). The corsages are rather high and tight, the sleeves plain, and open under the arm à la Grecque—that is, it descends down the outside the arm, over an under sleeve of tarlatane bouillonné (puffed) which is continued to the wrist.

Scarfs with facings or lappels have in some degree superseded mantelets; they are disposed in a variety of ways; nothing can be more elegant than a scarf of camelion silk with a border to correspond of a ruche of chicorée (silk cut in notches). Lace is frequently substituted for the ruche; it is sometimes laid on flat and sometimes placed on full.

Some elegant Caps are made of tulle bouillonné (puffed); others are composed of half scarf, forming a lappet on one side, others again are composed of a small scarf placed à la Fanchon—that is, across the top of the head, and tied under the chin.

Silk Hats are mostly ornamented with tulle or lace.

Some charming Drawn Capotes are composed of taffeta covered with gauze, which is festened down to each division of the drawing; they are ornamented with ribbons and flowers.

SCENE FROM THE NEW OPERA OF "THE BRIDES OF VENICE," AT DRURY-LANE THEATRE.

THE INFANT POWER.

This really wonderful child, who is only nine years old, is now playing at the Strand Theatre. She is a native of Dublin, where she has made a "great sensation," and comes before a London audience stamped with the applause of most competent judges—the people of Dublin, who have pronounced her to be the Infant Power. She is said to have shown extraordinary talent at a very early age. Her father's mercantile reverses force her before the public; and while we would not be supposed to encourage infant wonders, we may venture to prophecy that she will be eminently successful. She first appeared in the character of Dr. O'Toole, in the well known farce of the "Irish Tutor," which she played with tact, humour, and self-possession almost incredible. She sings well—her Irish jig is perfection. She has played Paddy Murphy, in Lover's clever farce of "The Happy Man," and Phi Moor, in the "Irish Lion," to the delight of the audience, who call her before the curtain nightly to testify their approbation. Altogether she gives a most truthful delineation of the Irishman; and when we behold the mixture of quiet humour and comic archness she throws into her performance, our delight would be unalloyed, but that her very perfection painfully reminds us of the lamented Power.

THE THEATRES.

DRURY LANE.

On Monday last Benedict's new opera entitled the "Brides of Venice" was produced with most triumphant success. The story of the many-fathered libretto, as well as we could collect, was as follows.—Soranzo, a Venetian nobleman, and (as they manage it in Italy) at the same time a Count, or chief of a band of pirates, pays his addresses to a young heiress, Francesca, and is rejected, because the lady is pre-engaged to a Count Alberto, whom she is to wed at "The Annual Festival of the Brides." Soranzo resolves to have her, in the teeth of all opposition, and whilst the marriage ceremony is about to be performed, revives the operation of the Rape of the Sabines, and carries off all the females. This is the first "peacy of the ring."—And first:—Here we have the heroine Francesca in a prison of the robbers, where she wins the affections or rather the sympathies of an Arab girl, who had been the victim of the chief bandit, and who generously relieves upon releasing her from her dangerous captivity A vessel is shipwrecked on the neighbourhood, and the pirates, amongst their other seizures lay hold of Alberto, who is in a state of swoon. He ultimately recovers, and through the information of the Arab page (Naama) finds that Francesca, his beloved and betrothed, is confined in the same castle. Here every body is in a state of bewilderment. How they got there is an unimportant matter—the difficulty is—"how are they to get out." It is a regular "deus vindice nodus." But, after all, they manage by mortal means to escape—poetical justice is bestowed upon the respective "Dramatis Personæ," and all ends happily.

MRS. A. SHAW, IN THE NEW OPERA OF "THE BRIDES OF VENICE."

Now for the music. We will begin with that which in general is the last thing composer thinks about—namely, the overture. It is full of new and charming boughts, wrought up by the hand of a skilful and ingenious artist to the highest tch of effect It was enthusiastically encored. The opening chorus, trates carousing song, is very spirited, perhaps a little too noisy, but that is a small sin now a days Mrs. Alfred Shaw, in the part of the disguised Arabian irl, was all that could be charming in "voice, gesture, gait"—the manner in which she sang "On Memory cease" was an exquisite performance of an exquisite composition. "By the sad sea waves" is one of those things which are produced once in a century, and with little chance, too, of being sung twice in a like eriod as it was by our fair vocalist, except by herself. It was most rapturously encored. Harrison had several beautiful morceaux, and executed them in an evidently improved style. The great French tenor has been of some use to many of our English vocalists The airs, "If a tear should repose," and "At noon upon the beach I stood" were beautifully sung and loudly demanded a second time. Miss Romer as Francesca sang brilliantly, and acted with great feeling and energy. Borrani, in consequence of Sireton's indisposition, undertook the part of the Pirate Chief at a very short notice, and acquitted himself, considering the circumstances, most creditably.

The choruses and concerted pieces were most admirably constructed, and as admirably performed. The nuptial chorus, or "Vilanella," is a charming composition in the style of the old Italian madrigal writers: it is in five parts, of every counterpoint abounding in a profusion of harmonious contrivances, in which Grace is happily made to be the attendant upon Science. The words, too, are quaint and suggestive of the delicious madrigalian school:—

> "Envy and foloying, Pride of ever craving,
> Turn your selfen in vawe from our delights aside;
> While Hope joyously her sunny tresses waving,
> Singeth o'er our Fat Isle, and blessing on the bride."

The ensemble of the opera is beautiful in the extreme, and adds another wreath of laurel to the brow of Weber's talented pupil. The music was very fully attended, and at the fall of the curtain the composer and the principal performers were called upon to respectively acknowledge the delight of the audience. There is no doubt that "The Bride of Venice" will have a long and successful career at the house before they are summoned elsewhere to receive the congratulations of the friends and admirers of the composer's genius in his fatherland.

Of illustrations are to perish!" Mrs. Alfred Shaw, whose part may, in some respects, be considered the most successful in the opera. The scene is the last; and very ingeniously exhibits the banquet room of the pirate, with the dungeon beneath it, wherein the captive, Francesca (Miss Romer), is discovered; a platform being erected of the whole width of the stage, to represent the flooring of the room. This notion is not new; but, it has never before, we think, been so effectively carried out. In our opening, the moment is chosen at which the Arab page, Naama (Mrs. A. Shaw), is about to conduct Count Alberto (Mr. W. Harrison), to the secret doorway, by which he may descend to the dungeon he wots, where Francesca is awaiting exploring. The whole of this scene, as well artistically and mechanically, of admirable construction, and shke creditable to the scene painter and the machinist. The richness of the banquet-room, with its strictly architecture and its costly appointments, backed by the picturesque ocean and rock scenery, and most effectively lit (for the auditory was almost in darkness), contrasted finely with the gloom of the dungeon, the white robe, hair and twinkling lamp. Then, the melodramatic business of the scene: the meeting of Alberto, Francesca, and the pirate Count, in the dungeon, whilst the pirate horde are plotting in the apartment above—was very dramatic; and the novelty of the tremolando-like singing her finale from the platform, some ten feet above, and the superb costumes of the entire tableau—caused the curtain to descend amidst a shout of applause.

HAYMARKET

On Monday last, to the great delight of his personal friends, and all lovers of legitimate acting, Mr. W. Farren reappeared upon these boards, apparently quite recovered from his recent illness. The scenery was "The School for Scandal;" and in the part of Sir Peter Teazle, Mr. F. never before appeared to greater advantage. He was in excellent spirits, and, indeed, seemed quite elated at the opportunity of once more being enabled to display his talents in public. He is now Farren redivivus: we feared some time ago that we had reason to apply to him Ben Jonson's epitaph on Salathiel Pavy —

> "He did not, what now we moan,
> O'ermen early,
> "That the Parca thought him one
> "He play'd so truly!"

But the Fates, in the presentintance, have proved more kind, and have restored him to us till his venerable age. At the close of the play, on Monday evening, he was enthusiastically called for by the audience; and, on his re-appearance, he briefly thanked them for his brilliant reception.

Mr. W. Farren is one of three sons of the late Mr. Farren, of Gower-street, Bedford-square, formerly a distinguished member of the Covent-Garden company After being educated at the seminary of Dr. Barrow, of Soho-square, Mr. W. Farren fixed upon the stage as his future profession, and, accordingly, made his début in the character of Sir Archy Macsarcasm, at the Fyfe-ish Theatre, when then partly belonged to his elder brother, Percy, and was most favourably received. He next proceeded to Dublin, where he became an immense favourite. Offers from the Haymarket were repeatedly declined, his present position being at once safe and profitable, for, as stage-managers, and most popular actor, his annual benefit was in itself an independent income. Ultimately, however, he came to London; on Thursday, the 10th of September, 1818, he made his first bow to an English audience in the character of Sir Peter Teazle.

It is curious to remark, that in his return to the stage on Monday, he appeared in the same character as that in which he made his début so successfully In would be needless to enumerate the various parts which Mr. Farren has appeared in since that time, or to enter into any minute analysis of particulars, where the whole is chance erised by such genius and fidelity to nature. Mr. W. Farren is deci edly one of the greatest actors of our time, or in our memory

After "The School for Scandal," on Monday evening, Mr St. Leon, of Her Majesty's Theatre, performed a concerto on the violin, of his own composition, and elicited the loudest applause.

ST JAMES'S.

Herr Döhler, who has achieved a fashionable reputation in this country, has again established himself at the St. James's Theatre, and appeared on Tuesday evening surrounded by all the tasteful and costly accessories of his art to charm. The general treats of a pianoforte concert, the branches which he throws over a partition; the raising of the cards, at will, out of a lyre-shaped piece of mechanism; the shooting of the lemon, and the passing of the glove into a walnut; the washing of the pocket-handkerchief; and the enrolling of seed pigeons into live ones; were repeated and met with unqualified applause. Among the new tricks, was that of dropping a ring into a large goblet of inky-looking liquid, which, on being carried and unstirred, appears full of limpid water, with a gold fish swimming in it, and bearing the ring in its mouth; this was very neatly performed, and elicited loud approbation. The little incidental tricks of legerdemain (which, to say the truth, are more intricate and difficult than they were very successful; and the concluding trick of supplying the whole house with bouquets out of an old hat, threw the spectators into ecstasy, and brought the curtain down triumphantly. The theatre was extremely well attended, and proved that Herr Döhler's ingenuity had not been forgotten since his last visit.

IRELAND.

The Irish State Trials.—The affidavits put in by the law officers of the Crown, in reply to those made on the part of the traversers by their solicitors, are very lengthy; their substance, however, may be briefly given:—Messrs. Archer and Dickinson swear that they committed no fraud, or were guilty of no corruption themselves, and they further swear that they believe all was the result of more accident; they also swear that they had nothing to do in the making up of the lists, nor do they know anything of the matter except what they have heard from their chief clerks, Mr. Hall, whom they most implicitly believe Mr. Magrath, in his affidavit, swears that he is not aware of, nor was he in any way privy to, any alteration or suppression in the list of names. Mr. Hodges, the high constable of Clonmel, swears that the jurors' book was kept as usual in the Queen's Bench when Mr. Moore, of counsel for the traversers, consented that the jury should be permitted to return to their homes each day at the rising of the court, and when Mr. Roche, one of the jurors, was sworn as John Right. It is not yet known on what day the judges will give sentence.

The Repeal rent at the last weekly meeting was under £300.

Colonel Stoddart and Captain Conolly.—Captain Grover has just received letters from Dr. Wolff, dated Teheran, Feb. 12th. The doctor had been received with great distinction by the King of Persia, who recollected having met him at Meshed (when he was only fifteen years old) with Abbas Royal, and reminded him of their conversation. The doctor rode in full canonicals, accompanied by Col. Shiel in his uniform, going to and returning from the court. He then visited the ambassador, recently arrived from Bokhara, who declared in toto the fact of the execution of our friends. The ambassador and the attaché's rose when he entered the room, treated him with the greatest civility and respect, and the ambassador expressed a wish to become acquainted with him in Bokhara. The doctor was to leave Teheran on the 14th of February, accompanied by an escort, ordered by the King, and by Rejab, who had been servant to both Stoddart and Conolly; he had been instructed at Bokhara, by the Ameer's order, on account of his faithful attachment to his masters, and had exposed his life by going to Cabul. Colonel Shiel's exertions have been unremitting.

TO the BENEVOLENT.—A late MEMBER of the DAILY PRESS, who has for many years contributed to amuse and inform the PUBLIC, now compelled to SOLICIT THEIR ASSISTANCE. In the summer of 1841, whilst in the country, reporting the Elections for the present Parliament, he was attacked by repeated FITS, the wearing power of which has rendered him incapable. The result was the setting in of CONSUMPTION, which gradually fastened on him until he was obliged to resign his chief means of support in the summer of 1842. In 1844 he was obliged to throw up his minor engagements. Since his retirement he has gradually become more feeble. His savings, always kept down by his duty as the eldest son of a poor family, are exhausted, as has his wealthy friends. Perhaps, a few generous strangers will come forward and help to secure to him the means of procuring those comforts and medical aid which he may require during the short remainder of his days References may be made by letter to the Editor of the Sun, 112, Strand, by whom any donation will be thankfully acknowledged. Sums already received.—From the Right Hon. T. B. Macaulay, M.P., £5; J. H. Smith, Esq., Thames Bank, £10; and £2 from several anonymous contributors.

EXTRACT FROM OLD MOORE'S ALMANACK for 1844 MAY—CARE OF HEALTH.—The human frame often suffers greatly during this season, the hurtful influence of which is assisted by the premature changes of the dress of summer. Those on whom the blight of consumption has fallen, frequently sink under it about this period, though the disease had commenced its ravages many weeks or months before. Those who have a tendency to consumption on the part of their delicate persons to the morning and evening chills, should be carefully avoided. Also, the full, and plethoric will be benefited by the use of cooling medicines, as PARR'S LIFE PILLS, and very temperate diet, as a tendency of blood to the head is not uncommon among such. Exercise must be attended to, and other fatal diseases of the bowels, to which persons even require some cooling purgative, as PARR'S LIFE PILLS, which will lessen the heat of the skin, and perfectly cleanse the system."—PARR'S LIFE PILLS are sold by al. respectable Medicine Venders. Sole Proprietors, T. ROBERTS and Co., 18, Crane-court, Fleet-street, London, on the Government Stamp.—Sold in boxes, at 1s. 1½d., 2s. 9d., and family packets, 11s. each.

PATENT FLEXIBLE VELVET HATS.—Messrs. JOHNSON and Co., 113, Regent-street, corner of Vigo-street, Hatters to the Queen and Royal Family, Inventors and Patentees of the Flexible Velvet Hat. From the construction of the Patent Flexible Hats, the unpleasant pressure on the forehead is entirely removed, and, by their extreme elasticity, they are capable of accommodating themselves perfectly to the shape of the head, the crown, moreover, being ventilated, is an additional advantage. For Ladies' Riding Hats they will be found most light and elastic, but will retain their position on the head without the least discomfort.—To be had only of the Patentees, Messrs. JOHNSON and Co., 113, Regent-street; and GRIFFITHS and JOHNSON, 2 Old Bond-street Piccadilly.

SPRING.—The prevalency of cutaneous visitations at this period of the year inculcates the necessity of preserving the Skin in a pure and healthy state, so that its functions may be duly performed. The high and universal celebrity which ROWLAND'S KALYDOR has attained as an effective remedy for sunburn and scorching exposure of all impurities of the skin, is during the period of Spring most peculiarly evinced. This preparation, eminently BALSAMIC, RESTORATIVE, and INVIGORATING, is justly celebrated for safety in application, as for unfailing efficacy in removing all impurities and discolorations, and in promoting a healthy freshness and transparency to the arm and complexion. Its universally great demand evinces the capacity of unprincipled Shopkeepers, who give the title of 'GENUINE" KALYDOR to compounds of their own manufacture, of the most deleterious character, containing mineral astringents utterly ruinous to the complexion, and by their repellent action on the dissasering health. It is therefore imperative on purchasers to see that the words "ROWLAND'S KALYDOR," are on the wrapper.—All others are FRAUDULENT COUNTERFEITS!

RECALL OF THE GOVERNOR-GENERAL OF INDIA.

VOYAGE, however smooth, may be checked by the vessel striking on a sunken rock, and such impediments lie beneath the surface of even the calmest political waters. The stout and strong ship in which the Ministry seemed to be embarked has just encountered such a shock; and though the blow will not cause absolute wreck, it has betrayed some want of skill in the pilots, and has spread no little consternation among the crew. To drop metaphor, the Government has been galled and checked by a resolution of the Board of Directors of the East India Company, recalling Lord Ellenborough, and deposing him from his "pride of place;" the reason alleged being that he had exhibited symptoms of the elevation being too great for the strength of his head to bear with steadiness. This has been done, too, not only without the sanction of the Government, but against its express representations. Downing-street has been pitted against Leadenhall, and mercantile policy has vanquished Ministerial partialities. Truly our "merchants are princes," and among the greatest of powers are our "traffickers of the earth." A trading corporation—for the East India Company was at first no more—has grown to be a political power, ruling its "dusky millions" of people, and its thousands of square miles of territory, with undeniable energy, though the justice of some of its policy, in past times at least, may be open to impeachment. Its empire in the East, and its political importance at home, are the growth of two centuries; its privileges have been gained from time to time from the indulgence, or the neglect, of the home Government, till it is now an imperium in imperio—a power acting concurrently with the Executive, and, as we see, capable of doing so independently of it; it is a real fourth estate.

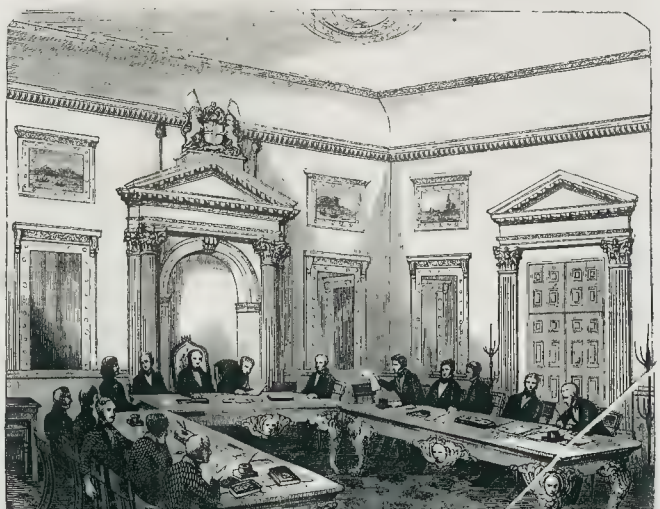
This body has recalled Lord Ellenborough, and, using the powers the law vests in it, has done so without the consent of the Government. The event has taken the public altogether by surprise, though the Ministry must have for some time expected it, and there is considerable speculation afloat as to what are the causes of this sudden recall, how the Government and the Board of Directors took so different a view of the same circumstances, and how they who have differed so widely about the continuance in power of the present Governor-General, will be able to agree in the appointment of his successor.

The last point we must leave to time, and the parties themselves to settle; but with respect to the two former ones we may shortly state what we believe may have led to the rupture. In the first place, the personal character of Lord Ellenborough was not, in many respects, such as to inspire over-much confidence in the members of such a body as the Board of Directors. Ready and fluent in debate, and not without the reputation of a certain smart ability, highly prized, because always useful in political cliques and parties, he was not known for any great prudence in action, or much steadiness of judgment. The world rarely errs much in its estimate of public men, and Lord Ellenborough was generally set down as one of more shew than solidity, rather fast than safe, carrying too little ballast, and spreading too much sail. But as all Governors General have a council to advise them, the Board hoped the best, confirmed the appointment, and gave him a dinner before he sailed, in November, 1841. Even at that dinner the character of the man appeared—and that not favourably. It was stated at the time, that his address on that occasion was rather too arrogant for the position of the holder of a great, but still only a deputed power, in the presence of those deputing him. There was in it too much of the "absolute shall," and the speech of the Duke of Wellington on the same occasion contained something approaching to, if not quite, a rebuke. On landing in India, one of his first acts was a proclamation asserting that his policy would be one of peace, in opposition to that of his predecessor, Lord Auckland, which had been one of war; perhaps unavoidable, but certainly, at last, disastrous. At that moment the greatest activity was necessary to retrieve the last sad steps of the fatal Affghan campaign, and, above all, to rescue the British prisoners remaining in the hands of Akbar Khan, whose lives were in peril daily from the treachery and revenge of their captor. But at this juncture, when military operations were absolutely required, he hesitated, and showed reluctance, as if he wished the catastrophe of his predecessor's course to be as fatal as possible; and it was by a movement made almost in disobedience of his orders, and by the help of a lucky accident, that these unfortunate prisoners were rescued at last. But though thus reluctant to conclude a war that others had begun, he soon displayed a mischievous alacrity in commencing hostilities on his own account. The affair of the "Somnauth gates;" his proclamations to his "friends and brothers," the princes of India; his doing with "pomp and circumstance" what could not but rankle in the minds of the Mahomedan population, for the sake of a mere gasconading exhibition—all this will not soon be forgotten. Then came the quarrel with the Ameers of Scinde, and the invasion of their territory, with battles which were brilliant victories, it is true, but there is a deep feeling abroad against fighting for fighting's sake; moreover, the territory was unhealthy, and the army was wasted by disease; the expense and the loss were evident enough, and were no doubt felt at the India House, but the advantages were not so apparent. This was followed by the advance on Gwalior, ending in an attack on a place and an enemy whose strength and numbers were underrated. The consequence was a hard battle, and a terrific loss on our side, not compensated by a knowledge of the fact that the Governor-General exposed himself rather ostentatiously to the fire of the enemy's artillery, which on this occasion was served with very mischievous ability. The place was taken, but the folly of the Governor-General in exposing the empire to the risk of losing its head in case the brains should have been knocked out of his own, was not the less glaring, cannon balls being no respectors of persons. While all this was going on, there was an under current of unpopularity setting against him, caused by what is stated to have been his overbearing demeanour to the civil officers of the Company; his sympathies were with the military, and he evidently considered that India is only to be governed as it was gained—by the sword. All his acts have been aggressive; we hear of no exertions made that could tend to develope the natural resources of the empire, or improve the condition of the people. War is too expensive and too cruel a game to be permitted by those who can prevent it, merely to indulge the vanity and caprice of a political dandy who apes the military chief, and, lacking the vast genius of his model, only earns, by his imitation of it, the name that has actually been bestowed upon him in India, of a "Brummagem Napoleon." With power placed in such hands, how could the Board of Directors feel safe? They must have trembled at the arrival of every despatch, lest they should hear of some new war commenced or commencing; and if we add to all this the feeling caused by a contemptuous reception, if not actual disregard, of the orders of the Directors themselves, we shall have stated enough to account for their recall of Lord Ellenborough—a recall which does not spring from political antipathies to him, for in politics they agree, and which is not the result of divided counsels, for the vote that displaced him was unanimous.

The Duke of Wellington has severely censured the step taken by the Board of Directors; he has pronounced it a "most indiscreet exercise of power." He speaks from information of which neither the Parliament nor the public is yet in possession, and we are quite aware of the weight that his opinion will carry with it. But he is a soldier—a "man of war from his youth," and joins to his professional predilections the feelings and partialities of the head of a great party, bound to parry as best he may a heavy blow on its supremacy. On the other hand is the unanimous decision—not hastily given—of a whole body, composed of men conversant with business and acquainted with the facts of the case—men charged with a great responsibility and deeply interested in the preservation of the integrity of the Eastern Empire. Such men do not come to grave decisions on trifling or insufficient grounds, and, we confess, if these eternal wars and battles have alarmed them, we share their aversion to them. It is better for mankind that the "commercial principle" should sometimes check the lust of conquest; let us improve what we have, rather than add eternally to territory already too vast to be well managed. To spread our strength over an almost limitless space, must continually weaken us;

> "Realms by such means acquir'd demand more pain,
> More care to keep them than at first to gain."

War may be more popular with an army, but peace is the best policy for a state, and we cannot see that either our honour or our interest requires a continual course of aggression. Judging then from the character of the man, and his conduct as a ruler, we think the board of Directors have, as far as yet appears, sufficient grounds for recalling Lord Ellenborough, and we cannot but believe that by a little good management the Government might have prevented this inconvenient collision.



THE COURT OF DIRECTORS, EAST INDIA HOUSE.

THE COURT OF EAST INDIA DIRECTORS.

The unusual assertion by the Court of Directors of the East India Company of their right to remove a Governor-General, without the assent of the Ministry, has invested that body with a degree of public interest which does not ordinarily attach to their proceedings. What the precise motive of the Directors may be for the dethronement of the Viceroy have not, as yet, transpired. It is allowable, however, to conjecture that the trenchant system of government adopted by the quondam President of the Board of Control had in it something peculiarly offensive to the constituted authorities. By all accounts, Lord Ellenborough, from the very commencement of his career, in February, 1842, endeavoured to act independently of the home powers, treating their despatches cavalierly, answering them dictatorially, and putting all manner of slights upon the officers of their civil service, to whom young and inexperienced military men were frequently preferred.

The Council Board, which, in 1833, in his place in Parliament, Lord Ellenborough treated as indispensable to a Governor-General, ceased to enjoy any portion of his respect the moment he himself assumed the reins of Government. He became in his own person the ambulatory and independent secretary which had previously been the object of his reprehension: all this has been sufficient to arouse the ire of the Directors, and to suggest the very strong measure now reported to. Whether it has been really the moving cause, however, we do not pretend to know. It is sufficient for us that the Court of Directors have acquired by their resolution enough of temporary importance in the eyes of the public to justify our presenting a sketch of the interior of the Court Room, during the deliberations of that assembly and of the Court of Proprietors; and we dare say that many of our readers abroad will be interested in seeing, for the first time, a correct representation of that mysterious body, the Koompeni, who, from a handful of British merchants trading under sufferance with some half a dozen ships, in the days of the good Queen Bess, have grown into the dignity of sovereigns of the largest empire in the world.

The commercial character of the East India Company was destroyed in 1833, when the trade with India and China was thrown open to the world; but the interest upon the stock was secured to the members of the corporation by act of Parliament, and the political power and patronage of the Directors remained with them without the shadow of abatement. Of course, at the great distance at which the authorities in Leadenhall-street are placed from their subjects in India, it is impossible for them to exercise a very close and constant interference with the local government. That power, therefore, resides itself, in a great measure, into a species of ex post facto control; they confirm or rescind the measures adopted by their delegates. But, in their hands, also, alone reposes the right to nominate to the civil, military, and other services in India. The Governors of the several Presidencies, the Bishops, Commanders-in-Chief, Writers, Cadets, Chaplains, Assistant-Surgeons, Naval and Marine functionaries, Advocates general and Standing Counsel, and a variety of miscellaneous officers, all receive their appointments from the Court of Directors; and, as the patronage in this way is very extensive, the position of a Director becomes one of great consideration, and is ardently competed for by the men distinguished of the Company's servants, soon after their retirement from service abroad, or by merchants who have acquired knowledge and fortunes in India.

The Directors are twenty-four in number, and are chosen by the Proprietors. Each Director must hold £2000 of the Company's stock, and the Proprietors who elect him are only eligible to vote on possession of £1000 so to, which carries with it a single vote. A larger share gives a greater number of votes, but not in a proportionate degree, £10,000 merely conferring the right to four votes. There are about 2400 proprietors, a proportion of whom have only an interest in the stock to the extent of £400, which gives no power to vote at all; but, although they have the power to do so at the meetings of the Court. Nine of the Directors go out annually, by rotation, and are eligible for re-election after a two months's service.

The proceedings of the Court of Directors are subject to the supervision not of a Board of Control, as now appointed by the Crown, but to the Parliament of Great Britain, and, in several matters, to the approval of the Court of Proprietors; but, as we have seen, the authority of the first body is not indispensable to the validity of a great exercise of power; Parliament seldom interferes, excepting when the periodical renewal of the Charter is discussed; and the control of the Proprietors is purely nominal, if we may judge by the ordinary results of an attempt to pronounce a decree of censure against any of the acts of the Directors or the local governments which they protect.

The apartment engraved upon the preceding page is the handsomest saloon in the East India House, in Leadenhall-street. It is occupied by the Court of Directors, and is usually termed the Court Room; it is said to be an exact cube of thirty feet; it is superbly gilt, and embellished with large looking-glasses; the effect of its too great height being much diminished by the position of the windows near the ceiling. From the north and six pictures, representing the three Presidencies, the Cape, St. Helena, and Tellicherry. Over the chimney is a fine piece of sculpture in white marble, representing Britannia seated on a globe by the sea-shore, receiving homage from three female figures—Africa, China, and India. Asia offers spices with her right hand, and with her left leads a camel; India presents a box of jewels; and Africa rests her hand upon the head of a lion. The Thames, as a river god, stands upon the shore; a labourer is cording a bale of merchandise; and ships are sailing in the distance. The whole is supported by two caryatid figures, intended for Brahmins.

On Wednesday last, a Court of Directors was held at the East India House, when Major-General Sir George Pollock, G.C.B., was appointed a provisional member of the Council of India.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

(From our own Correspondent.)

PARIS, April 30.

SPAIN.

We are indebted to persons coming from Spain for the little information we receive of the important events now taking place in that unfortunate country. All private letters being opened at the Post-office, and the journals (excepting the Ministerial) prevented by publication being severely examined by the censors. Many rumours were afloat of a change of Ministry, but serious differences have arisen between Christina and Narvaez, it was resolved that Bravo should for the present remain nominally at the head of the executive, and that Narvaez and Christina should govern the country. One of the favourite schemes of Narvaez, by which he will be enabled to place his satellites at the head of the different departments, and thus secure his power as a Dictator, is to divide the kingdom into districts, with twelve Governors-General. Three districts are to be formed after great rivers and mountains; thus the province of Madrid is to be called Manzanarès—capital, Madrid; Toledo, the province of Tagus—capital, Toledo, and so on. It is generally supposed that this important innovation will be effected without the consent of the Cortes—indeed it is much doubted whether the Cortes will be assembled this year.

If money can be got, the Spanish navy is to be considerably increased; it is now reduced to the frigate Christine; brigs, Manzanarès and Nervion; steamboats, Mazeppa, Pizarro, Isabelle II., and Andalus; goelette, Guesario; luggers, Vidasoa, and armed packet, Cartagena Towards the end of the month the Queen will leave Madrid for the baths of Echevarlcha in the Basque Provinces. But, before crossing the Ebro, it is expected that, by royal decree, she will restore the "fueros" privileges to the hardy mountaineers. Should she not do so, her sojourn in Guipuscoa would be anything but safe.

The Government, desirous of creeping into the good graces of the Pope, are not only expelling the clergy, but have actually sent M. Castillo, Christina's private secretary, on a special mission to his Holiness.

The late insurrection in the Havannah has been more extensive than was generally imagined. I am most credibly informed that upwards of 3000 Blacks have been imprisoned, that the accused are tried by a Court Martial, and those condemned immediately executed.

ITALY.

The last accounts from Italy are more satisfactory. The insurgents, disheartened, have retired to the mountains. The Austrian Field Marshal Count Raditsky, Commandant of the Lombardo-Venetian Kingdom, has taken the most active measures for interventional repression of all disturbances that may arise in Italy.

The last reports from Tunis state that the dispute between the Bey and Sardinia has been, by a measure, arranged, by the mediation of England. The arrangement was but yesterday signed, but no difficulty any longer exists. The two parties return to the stipulations of the treaty of 1839, and the Bey promises the immediate exportation of 3000 measures of corn for the Government of Sardinia, and to pay 6000 piastres, as an indemnity to the Sardinian subjects who had suffered by the Bey's unexpected prohibition to export.

I know not what reliance is to be placed in the following paragraph, extracted from the Augsburg Gazette, of the 26th, under the head "Italy."—"England," says the journal, "neglects nothing to put an end to the hostile disposition of the Irish clergy. It is asserted that the Cabinet of London is desirous of obtaining from the Pope an episcopal bull, to exhort the clergy of the Irish Catholics. Lord Ashburton, who has been to London recently has, it is said, stirred himself on this important subject; but as Great Britian has not a diplomatic representative at Rome, it is added, that Prince Metternich has been requested to use his influence."

GERMANY.

The Archduke Albert, accompanied by his father, the Archduke Charles, quitted Vienna on the 21st, for Munich, to celebrate his marriage with the Princess Hildegarde.

The place of a Municipal Councillor of Berlin having become vacant, by a death, Mr. David Anselm Benda, a young lawyer of the Jewish persuasion, was unanimously elected, and his nomination has been approved of by the Government. Since the promulgation, in 1813, of the liberal edict relating to the Israelites, and which is still in force, though almost fallen into desuetude, this is only the second Jew that has been chosen by the citizens to fill the important office of Municips. Councillor of Berlin. The first was the celebrated writer on numismatics, David Friedlaender, a pupil of the illustrious philosopher, Moses Mendelssohn.

The King of Prussia has conferred the order of the Red Eagle of the First Class upon Count Bentinck, late Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary from the King of the French.

The Grand Duke and Duchess Cæsarewitch of Russia arrived at Dresden on the 19th.

FRANCE.

I never remarked Paris so full as at the present moment; the streets are literally crowded with strangers attracted by curiosity to witness the exhibition of national industry, which opens to morrow. Politics for the moment are quite slight of; even the rejection of two Ministerial candidates seems to pass by unnoticed, so determined are the Parisians to enjoy their extraordinary fine weather and the sights at the Champs Elysées. I was going to say that the "Polka" was forgotten; but it is not so, it still lives, but I am inclined to think that it is in a galloping consumption, and that it cannot last another winter; a rival—a formidable rival—has been ushered into the gay world, called "La Pantheira," a species of parody on the "Polka," but with more humour, and certainly more decency. This dance was first seen at a brilliant soirée, given by the Princess Czartoryski, and is now the rage of the fickle dancing world.

To-morrow is the King's Fête; the amusements are the same as last year. On the esplanade of the Invalids two theatres have been erected for the representation of military spectacles; there are also orchestres for dancing, and gymnopoles for climbing. In the garden of the Tuileries, in front of the Pavilion de l'Horloge, there will be a grand concert in the evening. Grand fireworks will be let off on the Quai d'Orsay and the Barrière du Trône. In the evening the Champs Elysées, the Place de la Barrière du Trone, the garden of the Tuileries, and all the public buildings will be illuminated.

The Duchess of Kent, generally accompanied by some member of the royal family, is making the round of our public monuments. Her Royal Highness enjoys perfect health, and seems highly gratified with the attention everywhere paid to her.

The Prince de Joinville has returned to Paris. The Palais Royal has been proposed to receive the King and Queen of the Belgians, who are expected to make a long stay in our capital. The Duke de Montpensier has returned from his military excursion in Algeria.

I am inclined to believe that great discontents reign throughout the army. On this subject the Courrier Français published the following article:—"Arrests of non-commissioned officers are still going on, and rumours of military conspiracies gain ground. Measures of vigour have been adopted against the 8th Regiment of Artillery, which lately quitted Toulouse. We are even assured that the Ministry has gone so far as to suspect some officers, and even of a high rank. The imprisonment of a colonel was for an instant thought of, and it was only owing to his family connexions that he was not arrested at the head of his regiment."

The Minister of War has completed, and ordered to be put in force, regulations for preventing duels in the army. Modes of reconciliation are prescribed not only for both the parties, but also for the seconds and the officers, before whom the affair is to be brought. In case all efforts fail, and a meeting takes place, the principals are to be under the surveillance of the provost marshal.

The race course on the 27th was well attended. The Plate of 1000 francs, offered by the Jockey Club for thorough-bred horses and mares, for three years old and upwards, bred in France, was cleverly won by Baron A. de Rothschild's (Beeswing).

The Grand Prix 3000 francs, for four years old thoroughbred colts and fillies, was carried away by Prince de Beauvau's Natua.

The Juniset Cup, for horses, mares, and geldings, of three years old and upwards, bred in France or Belgium, was won by Commodore Napier, the property of Baron A. de Rothschild.

The Administration des Haras Plate, of 2000 francs, for thorough-bred three-years-old colts and fillies, bred in France, whose pedigree is traced in the French Stud Book, was won by Conjecture, the property of Count A. de Morny.

The Hurdle Race of 1500 francs, offered by the Jockey Club, was beautifully won by Tiger, the property of Baron N. de Rothschild. Sir C. Ibbetson's Wild Irish Girl came in third, and Mr. White's Ida Lupus was distanced.

The Catholic paper, the Univers, says, that at Saulxur, near Cambrai, a Protestant minister, and 170 of his flock, had lately embraced the Catholic faith.

M. C. F. Lequine, one of the most eminent merchants of Paris, has left Paris for London. It is said that he has been sent for by the Queen and Prince Albert.

Our musical season is now over. One of the last, and perhaps most brilliant, concerts was that given on Friday last, by the celebrated violoncellist Jacques Offenbach; the rooms were so crowded that many was refused at the door. M. Offenbach leaves us to-morrow for London, where, I have no doubt, he will create as great a sensation as he has done this winter in Paris.

Doehler leaves to-morrow for London, and from thence for Germany.

It is at length decided that a statue of Rossini shall be placed in the Foyer of the Grand Opera.

Breton, one of our most celebrated composers of the old school, died a few days since, at an advanced age. He was born in France, on the 17th of September, 1776.

TURKEY.

Letters received from Bagdad state, that a Persian tribe, residing on the frontiers, had murdered its chief, and committed numerous excesses. The Persian Government sent an armed force, with several guns, to punish the offenders. The tribe has taken refuge in the Turkish territories.

The Belgian Minister, Baron de Behr, thinking that, during his late absence from Constantinople, his Chargé d'Affaires, M. Solweyns, had not been treated with proper attention by the Porte, has demanded of it upon that gentleman for an explanation. In the interview which took place between the two ministers, words grew so high that at length a mortal defiance was interchanged; General Aschman was the second chosen by M. de Behr, and Sir S. Canning consented to be the friend of M. de Borquiney. There has, however, been no bloodshed, for Sir S. Canning having invited both the belligerents to dinner, after mutual explanations, they were prevailed upon to shake hands.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—MONDAY.

The Lord Chancellor took his seat on the woolsack at five o'clock.

Lord BEAUMONT laid on the table a bill, the object of which was to place charitable bequests made to Roman Catholics on the same footing as charitable bequests made to Protestant Dissenters.—The bill was read a first time.

In reply to a question from Lord Colchester, the Duke of WELLINGTON stated the Government had ineffectually remonstrated with the Court of Directors of the East India Company against their threatened recall of Lord Ellenborough. His Grace added:—"I will not advert to anything on this occasion which is not notorious, on which it can be found in acts of Parliament; but I beg your lordships to observe that the body which has the power to recall a person from which I must call an act of indiscretion at least, this body, as a body, has no knowledge whatever of the instructions under which this officer has acted. They have stated reasons for which they recall him, but of the instructions sent to the Governor-General in consequence of the secret committee—have no knowledge whatever of the instructions under which the Governor-General has been acting, or of the events which have taken place in India, excepting that which has been the general knowledge of this and the other house of Parliament, and of the whole of the public in this country, and of the world at large. Yet your lordships will recollect, that when the papers were moved for (as the act of Parliament will show), have pronounced their opinion on the conduct of this officer, and have recalled him, thus depriving the Government and this country of his valuable services—the first instrument, I repeat it again—that we could find to carry out the duties of that great office, and making no provision whatever, excepting that they should nominate another Governor-General for the Government of India. Only three out of the twenty-four Directors of the Ministers of the day, and it is the fact that it has been in contemplation by these same gentlemen in respect to this very same Governor-General in the course of the past twelve months, that they were prevailed upon to alter their resolution, and not to proceed to his recall. This was previous to the late great operations in Gwalior, of which your lordships have read with so much satisfaction—operations which I am sure your lordships will have pronounced from the perusal of the reports which have been made, must have been founded upon the most just and discriminating measures on the part of the Governor-General.—Lord Beaumont did not deny or question the right of the Court of Directors to recall the Governor-General of India; but he must say that a more absurd law was never suffered to continue any length of time on the statute-book of any national country. Only three out of the twenty-four Directors could know anything of the instructions sent by Government, and yet the whole twenty-four possessed the right of recalling the Governor-General. The Court of Directors must withdraw the censures which the noble duke has passed upon them. If any attempt were made, in either house of Parliament, to obtain the sanction of noble lords and hon. gentlemen to the extraordinary conduct of the Court of Directors, the effort would be fruitless. Many of the proceedings ever known under similar circumstances.—The Marquis of CLANRICARDE could not but condemn the conduct of the noble duke in passing so grave a censure on the Court of Directors, without having given those lordships any knowledge of the grounds on which the removal of the Governor-General had been resolved on. (Hear, hear.) There must be some strong reasons for their resolution, seeing they have carried it into effect in opposition to the remonstrances of the Government, especially when the majority of the Directors are well known to be most favourably disposed towards the present Government. All the triumphs which Lord Ellenborough had achieved might have been achieved without the shedding of a drop of blood. He (the Marquis of Clanricarde) wished to ask the noble duke, before sitting down, whether it was the intension of her Majesty's Government to lay before their lordships the correspondence which had taken place between them and the Court of Directors relative to the grounds of the recall.—The Duke of WELLINGTON said he would be happy to lay before their lordships all the information in his power respecting the dismissal.—The Marquis of NORMANBY expressed his regret that the noble duke did not at once intimate his intention to lay before their lordships the Court of Directors' own statement of the reasons why they have acted as they have done. He could not conceive the justice of giving the Company the power of appointing the Governor-General without also giving them the power of recalling him. The appointment lay with the East India Company, subject to the veto of the Board of Control. When the papers were laid upon the table then they could ascertain where the indiscretion lay. He regretted that the noble duke had eulogised the conduct of the Governor-General. Whether the authorities which the noble duke was to the controvertre upon the point or not, he would venture to say that the proceedings at Gwalior were injudicious, particularly with regard to the treaty of Baraupoor. The Duke of WELLINGTON said he thought the noble marquis had a right to speak his sentiments, and he also would say that the conduct of Lord Ellenborough met with the entire approval of her Majesty's Government.—After a few observations from Lord CAMPBELL the subject dropped.

The Marquis of LONDONDERRY presented a petition from the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses of Sunderland against the proposed duty on coal imported into London. In doing so, he said he thought it most unfair to injure the interests of the large coal owners and their numerous dependents by imposing a tax for the purpose of such chimerical objects as the embankment of the Thames.—The WARNCLIFFE said the Government had not as yet decided upon imposing this tax.

The Marquis of NORMANBY postponed to Thursday his motion on the subject of charitable bequests donations and bequests.

Lord Campbell's Bail in Error Bill was read a second time, and was ordered to be committed on Thursday, at which stage the discussion on its principle will be taken.

On the motion of Lord CAMPBELL, the Court of Common Pleas Law Process bill was read a second time, and their lordships adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—MONDAY.

Mr. ROEBUCK raised a brief conversation respecting the recall of Lord Ellenborough from the government of India, similar to that which took place in the House of Lords.—Sir ROBERT PEEL re-stated that the recall of the Gove nor-General had originated with the Court of Directors of the East India Company. The nomination of a Governor-General was vested in the Company, subject to the approval of the Crown, but they had the absolute power of recall. The reasons for the probable return of the Governor-General had not been communicated to the Government by surprise, for the Executive were duly apprised of their intention before it was formally exercised; but he declined entering on the subject, or stating the reasons for the determination, lest the Government might take any proceeding on the inconvenience and danger which they foresaw would follow the proceeding.

The house was crowded, in expectation of hearing the financial statement, which was made by the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, who occupied about two hours in making his statement. The house was then going into a committee of ways and means, he rose, and commenced by recapitulating his estimates, made last year, of the probable returns of the revenue, and compared them with the actual results. Placing them in a tabular form, the items stand thus:—

	Estimated produce.	Actual produce.
Customs	£19,000,000 ..	£21,426,010
Excise	13,000,000 ..	12,956,000
Stamps	7,000,000 ..	7,01 ,000
Taxes	4,200,000 ..	4,192,000
Post Office	600,000 ..	656,100
Crown Lands	130,000 ..	147,000
Miscellaneous estimates ..	250,000 ..	258,100
China money	870,000 ..	803 000
Total	£50,050,000 ..	£52,5 ,124

This decrease of realised over antic pated income was favourable to the one side; and that of the expenditure was equally so on the other. They had received one million they had calculated on, and they had spent less. The charge for the Debt, and other items belonging to the Consolidated Fund, had been much the same as usual, the difference not exceeding £39,000. There was an apparent reduction in the actua. expenditure for the Army, as they had estimated that department of expenditure at £6,6,2,000, while the amount expended was only £6,118,000. But this arose from the Indian Government having contributed a larger share of the expenses incurred, and the restoration of tranquility in the East had rendered it unnecessary to keep very large sums in the military chests. There was also a reduction in the estimated expenditure for the Naval service of £50,000. Last year there was a deficit in the revenue of no less than £2,400,000, that being the amount in which the income was behind the current expenditure. Not only had the whole of this been cleared off, but there was a surplus revenue, after paying debts, of £1,400,000. His estimate for the ensuing year is as follows:—

Customs, estimated at	£21,500,000
Excise	13,000,000
Stamps	7,000,000
Taxes	4,200,000
Property-tax	5,100,000
Post Office	650,000
Crown Lands	140 000
Miscellaneous	250 000
Total in round numbers	£51,790,000

This is the estimated income for the ensuing year. The anticipated expenditure was, first, the charge for the Debt, which last year was £29,130,000, would be next year £29,257,000, being an apparent reduction of £1,420,000. This, however, was not a saving to the public, for it arose from the altered periods for paying the dividends, one of the consequences of the measure for reducing the Three-and-a-Half per Cents. The real saving which would result from this reduction—(from which, by the way, the amount of dissentients is very insignificant, only 49,110, considering the large amount of stock, for £250,000,000 to which the operation extends)—would be, for this year, only £313,000. The estimate of the expenditure for the ensuing year stands thus:—

Consolidated Fund, including Deficiency Bills	£30,027,000
Army	6,616,000
Navy	5,250 000
Ordnance	1,840,000
Miscellaneous	3,000,000
Extraordinaries	400,000

To which add £220,000, as a provision for paying off the Dissentients Irc., the reduced Three per Cents., and also a sum of £239 000, being the remainder of the Guarantee Fund of the South Sea Company. The total expenditure, as estimated for the ensuing year, is £51,790,000, leaving an apparent surplus of £3,146,509, and a real one of £2,870,000. General expectation anticipating a surplus revenue, he had been overwhelmed with applications for reductions of duties on every article which contributed to the revenue. The first article he proposed to deal with was glass. There was a distinctive duty between bottle and flint glass, which the great improvements in the manufacture not only rendered useless, but led to fraud on the revenue, by the substitution of one for the other, in receiving the drawback on exportation. He proposed to equal as them, reducing the duty on flint glass to the rate on bottle glass, that is, from twopence per pound to three farthings. This would stimulate trade, but the alteration will lead to a loss of £35,000 this year, the alteration not commencing till July, but hereafter the loss on a full year is calculated at £45,000. The next article was that of vinegar, on which the duty is to be repealed altogether, and by which there will be a loss of £25,000. The inducement to repeal the duty in its large use in manufactures, especially in calico-printing. Next, the duty on hammer licenses, and that on attorneys' certificates. The duty was originally imposed in war time; when it was reduced by Lord Althorp the effect was favourable; at present it operates injuriously, by depriving us of the full benefit of that revenue. The duty on marine insurance, which our capital and our credit entitle us to. At present, on every £100, where the premium is 5s., there is a duty of 1s. 3d.; up to 20s., a duty of 2s. 6d.; and above 30s., it is 5s. There is to be a new scale, as follows:—

	s.	d.
On every £100, where the premium is 10s.	0	3
From 10s. to 20s.	0	6
From 20s. to 30s.	1	0
From 30s. to 40s.	2	0
From 40s. to 50s.	3	0

Some minor reductions are to be made on stamps for agreements, and on proxies for voting for the election of railway directors. The next important reduction is to be made on the article of currants. This was now largely consumed in this country; it was mainly imported from the Ionian Islands; and the alteration is anticipated to be doubly favourable, both to the home consumer and the interests of a dependency in which we have a special interest. The duty is to be reduced from 22s. to 15s. per cwt. This will lead to a loss of revenue amounting to no less than £90,000; but increased consumption is expected to counteract this. Then, the duty on foreign coffee is to be altered from 8d., as fixed by the new tariff, to 6d., leaving only a differential duty of 2d. between foreign and colonial coffee. This reduction is also anticipated by an increase of the duty on chicory, which at present is largely used in the adulteration of coffee. The reduction of the duty on foreign coffee will cause a loss of £50,000. The last treaty, for which the Government propose to admit the sugar of foreign countries, where it is raised by free labour, at a differential duty of 10s.; which, as the colonial duty is 24s., will admit free foreign at 34s. This would extend our trade with countries east of the Cape of Good Hope, and enlarge our commerce with China itself. This neither involved a sacrifice of principle, nor hostility to Brazil, for the reduction of the duty on coffee was a proof of the contrary. Their object was to prevent sugar, the produce of countries tainted with slavery, from being imported into this country. But he referred all details to the time when the annual Sugar Duties Bill will be discussed; and concluded by congratulating the house on the cheering prospect of increasing prosperity which the state of the revenue afforded.—Mr. HUME, though admitting that the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer was clear and explicit, dissented from the policy pursued by the Government, especially on the subject of sugar, which he considered altogether a mistake, and in the maintenance of large military and naval establishments during peace.—Mr. WILLIAMS followed with similar comments; and Mr. BELL called attention to the operation of the tax on exported coal, which he considered to be unjust and to exhibit an abhorrence of slavery, they were not thus inconsistently and absurdly encourage it; for, depend on it, every amount of free-labour sugar taken out of the European market would only leave a vacuum to be filled up by slave produce.—Sir R. PEEL declined going into detail on the sugar question, till the proper time arrived, and advised the house to beware of reductions in our military and naval establishments, which might leave us unprepared for any contingency that might arise. He entered into statements to show that the coal-tax had not been so injurious in its operation; and thought that it was the best policy to wait until next year, when the income-tax would expire, before they announced any determination whether or not it is to be continued, as they would then be in a better position for reviewing their financial condition. He claimed credit for the proposed reductions outward, and on marine insurances, and thought that, seeing the amount was only £400,000 derivable from reductions, no better selections could be made.—Mr. LABOUCHERE spoke warmly on the contemplated alterations of the sugar duties, which he considered would prove not only fatally impolitic in principle and example, but impracticable in operation.—Mr. S. WORTLEY and Mr. P. M. STEWART joined in the debate; the latter complaining of the effect which the proposed alteration of the sugar duties would have, and affirming that the Government were last coming round to the Whig budget of 1841, with a slight difference, which would serve to cover their inconsistency for a year or two. In 1842, Sir R. Peel had applied the principle of "buying in the cheapest market" to onion seed, spiders, and herrings; the time was not far distant, it was to be hoped, when he would apply it to the article which constituted the essential food of the people. If the income-tax were intended to continue for five years, it would have been better to have at once made those reductions in duties which were postponed till next year, and were intended as a compensation for it. As it was, nothing was proposed which was likely to be very dangerous to the financial interests of the country.—After some further debate, shared in by Col. Sibthorp, Mr. M. Philips, Sir H. Douglas, Mr. C. Wood, Lord Howick, Mr. Hindley, and Lord Harry Vane, the Chairman put the question, and the house resumed, with the Speaker in the chair.

SIR J. GRAHAM then, in consequence of the lateness of the hour, postponed the committee on the Factories Bill till Friday, and the house adjourned.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—TUESDAY.

The Duke of RICHMOND presented a petition from persons who being tenants for lives of lands in Sussex held under ecclesiastical bodies, complained that the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, in whom all the lands belonging to suppressed prebendaries were vested, refused to grant renewals, thereby considerably diminishing the petitioners' interest, and interfering with many settlements and family arrangements which had been made on the faith that the leases would be renewed. The determination of the commissioners acted very harshly and unjustly, and as the subject was one of considerable general importance, the noble Duke pressed it on the consideration of their lordships, although he regretted the Bishop of London and the Bishop of Exeter maintained that the Ecclesiastical Commissioners only did their duty in managing the property entrusted to them so as to make the most of it. They had in this instance only followed the example of her Majesty, under whom no such leases as those had been renewed since her accession. The petition was received.

In reply to the Marquis of LONDONDERRY, the Earl of Haddington said it was not the intention of Government to propose an grant, this year, for completing the harbours of Portpatrick and Donaghadee.

The Inferior Courts Bill was brought up from the Commons, and read a first time.

Lord COTTENHAM moved the second reading of the Debtors and Creditors Bill. His lordship quoted the reports of the two commissioners in support of the principles embodied in the measure, and explained the provisions contained in this bill; he also cited the preamble of a late Act of Parliament, in which the principle of protecting the debtor from all process against the person, after he had given an adequate and several cessio bonorum in his favour, he stated that the bill he had then to oner to their lordships would give greater power against the property of debtors, and abolish the imprisonment for debt, which altogether it would have a tendency to obstruct between the laws of bankruptcy and insolvency. The bill would also provide that fraudulent debtors should be punished in accordance with the principles at present embodied in the bankruptcy and insolvency laws. The Lord CHANCELLOR approved of the measure, and said that nothing could be more inconsistent than the existence of two distinct laws, administered by two distinct sets of judges, for bankrupts and insolvents. The Duke of RICHMOND hoped that the improvement for small sums under the Courts of Requests would be abolished by this bill.—Lord DENMAN felt happy in being able to say that the monstrous abuses of small courts for the recovery of debts would be cured by this measure.—The bill was read a second time, and its committal postponed for a fortnight, in order that Lord Brougham's bill on a similar subject might be before their lordships at the same time.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—TUESDAY.

The Speaker took the chair at four o'clock.

One or two private bills were advanced a stage, and some papers from the Court of Chancery were presented.

Mr. PUSEY moved the further consideration of the report on the Newbury and Basingstoke Railway Bill.—Mr. C. RUSSELL moved that the report be postponed, there being, he said, many objections to the line, which required further investigation. After considerable discussion the house divided, when there appeared

Mr. CRAWFORD postponed to Tuesday next his motion to inquire into the effect of protective duties upon the national revenue.

Lord JOCELYN asked Mr. Hogg whether it was the intention of the Board of Directors of the East India Company to lay before the Court of Proprietors or the house, or the public, such documents as would show their reasons for the recall of Lord Ellenborough from the Governor-Generalship of India?—Mr. HOGG replied that he was not the organ of the Court of Directors in this house, though he had no objection, as a member of that body, to state his individual opinion. It was his belief that with regard to the production of papers before the Court of Proprietors, the Bishop of Lincoln, Lord Beaumont, Lord Dalhousie, Lord Foley, the Marquis of Normanby, the Bishop of Durham, and others.—Petitions against the measure were also presented.

The Duke of RICHMOND would not suspend their lordships till Thursday next his motion respecting the importation of foreign wool.

The North British Railway Bill was read a second time.

The Lord Chancellor then moved that the house do resolve itself into a committee on the Dissenters Chapels Bill. The noble and learned lord said, there had been a great clamour raised against the bill; that many petitions had been presented against it; but those petitions were all couched in the same language, and written in the same hand; indeed they all came from the same officina.—The Bishop of London moved as an amendment that the bill be read that day six months.—Lord BROUGHAM supported the bill.—The Bishop of EXETER opposed it.

After considerable discussion the amendment was negatived without a division, and their lordships adjourned until Monday next.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—FRIDAY.

The Speaker took the chair at four o'clock.

The Pontop and South Shields Railway Bill was read a third time and passed; as was also the Newcastle and Darlington Junction Railway B'l.

The Leeds and Selby Railway Purchase (No. 2) Bill was read a third time and passed.

Mr. HUME gave notice, that on Tuesday next he should move for a copy of all the correspondence between the East India Company and the Government relative to the recall of Lord Ellenborough from the Governor-Generalship of India.

After some further unimportant business the house proceeded to the discussion of the Factories Bill, on Sir James Graham's motion for going into committee.

MR. ROEBUCK moved a resolution deprecatory of any legislative interference with adult labour.—A long discussion ensued, but the arguments were for the most part, if not altogether, a mere repetition of those used when the subject was last before the house, and therefore not necessary to be given here. The house divided, when there appeared

The house then went into committee, pro forma, and having resumed, the other orders of the day were disposed of, and the house adjourned at one o'clock

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

THE ANTI-STATE CHURCH CONFERENCE.—On Tuesday, delegates from all parts of England, Ireland, and Scotland, met at the Crown and Anchor, Strand, forming a convention for the purpose of considering the best means of obtaining the severance of Church and State, and to adopt measures for the furtherance of that object. Upwards of 1200 delegates were present, amongst whom were Dr. Bowring, M.P.; Mr. Sharman Crawford, M.P.; Mr. J. S. Trelawny, M.P.; Mr. Joseph Sturge, Mr. St. D'Arcy Irvine, Dr. Burges, Rev. Dr. Pye Smith, Rev. Dr. Campbell, Rev. Dr. A. Thompson, Rev. Dr. Campbell, Rev. Dr. M'Farlane, Rev. Dr. Parry, Rev. Dr. Ritchie, Rev. Messrs. Carlile, Ainsworth, Brake, Eckett, Mursell, Mirams, Overbury, &c. A large number of ladies were on the platform. The Rev. Dr. John Burnett, of Camberwell, took the chair. The chairman addressed the meeting. Dr. Cox read a history of the origin of the conference and its objects. Mr. Shannon Crawford, Dr. Bowring, and others, addressed the company: resolutions were carried to enter Dr. Cox's paper on the records of the conference, and to affirm that the conference was not a demonstration of Nonconformist strength. A paper was read on the efficacy of the voluntary principle, and the conference adjourned.

COLONIAL CHURCH SOCIETY.—On Wednesday the annual general meeting of the friends and supporters of the Colonial Church Society, established for the purpose of sending out clergymen, catechists, and schoolmasters to the colonies of Great Britain, and to British residents in other parts of the world, was held in the great room of Exeter Hall, Strand. Captain Sir Edward Parry, R.N., in the chair. The report entered at some length into a review of the Society's proceedings in the various colonies to which agents had been sent, and stated that the receipts, which amounted to £20727 5s. 3d., had not covered the expenditure, and the committee therefore urged upon the meeting the necessity for additional support.

SOCIETY FOR THE PROPAGATION OF THE GOSPEL.—On Thursday the anniversary meeting of the members of this society was held at St. Paul's Cathedral. There were present the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Sheriffs of London, the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishops of London, Worcester, Chester, Worcester, Llandaff, Archdeacon Hale, the Rev. Ernest Hawkins, and a very large number of metropolitan clergymen. The Bishop of Hereford preached, and dwelt at some length on the operations of the society in India, New Zealand, New Brunswick, Newfoundland, and various other parts of the world where missionary stations had been founded. At the conclusion of his discourse a collection was made on behalf of the funds of the society.

CAMDEN SOCIETY.—On Thursday the seventh annual meeting of this society was held at the Freemasons' Tavern, Lord Braybroke, F.S.A., President, in the chair. The society enumerated 1300 members, and there were several candidates for admission from the United States and the East Indies. The publications for the year were—1 "Promptorium Parvulorum," 2 Three Letters upon the Suppression of Monasteries," and 3 "Some Papers relating to the Proceedings of the Earl Leycester in the Low Countries." Several works were in a state of forwardness, and upwards of thirteen others were under the consideration of the council. Several foreign correspondents forwarded very interesting miscellanies, and amongst them an Anglo-Norman manuscript, of great value, from Stockholm. The report, in conclusion, paid a well-merited tribute of respect to the late Mr. Cosens, a member of the council, one of the warmest supporters of the society. The receipts amounted to £1648 2s. 2d., and the expenditure left a balance of £89 2s. 10d. The funded property figured £739 19s. 1d. The report was adopted, and the officers for the ensuing year were re-elected; after which thanks were voted to the chairman.

HORTICULTURAL SOCIETY.—The anniversary meeting was held on Wednesday afternoon in the theatre of the institution in Alonmarle-street; Lord Prudhoe, president, in the chair. The report of the visitors exhibited an increase in the prosperity of the institution, as there was an increase in the receipts of the last year of £302 8s., whilst the arrears of contributions were also diminished.

GRAND ENTERTAINMENT AT THE MANSION-HOUSE.—On Tuesday the Lord Mayor and the Lady Mayoress gave a splendid entertainment to the members of the corporation and their families at the Mansion-House. It was the eighth or a series of dinners given by his Lordship and the Lady Mayoress in the most splendid style to the members of the Court of Common Council. The dinner, wines, and desert, were of first-rate excellence, and nothing could exceed the gratification felt by the numerous guests. On Thursday a splendid entertainment was given by the Lord Mayor to the Archbishops and Bishops after the performance of the service at St. Paul's. The entertainment took place in the Egyptian-hall, which has been recently fitted up and embellished.

MAY MEETINGS.—On Thursday last the anniversary meetings of the Homily and Prayer Book Society, the London City Mission, and the London Sunday School were held at Exeter Hall, when the usual reports of the anniversaries were presented. In some of the associations a slight decrease of funds was apparent, as may be observed with regard to religious and charitable societies in general.

MEDICAL PROTECTION ASSEMBLY.—The meetings of this extensive body are now held in Exeter Hall, and the enrolment of members is being proceeded with under the superintendence of the committee and the secretary, Dr. Brown, with the accustomed regulations. The object of the assembly is to form a general rein the medical profession, is likely to be carried out shortly. The total number of members now enrolled makes upwards of 1200, consisting of physicians, surgeons, apothecaries, and those in practice previous to the act of the years 1815. Communications on the subject have been forwarded to the committee from all parts of England, Scotland, and Ireland, agreeing in the objects of the assembly.

ZOOLOGICAL SOCIETY.—The annual meeting of this society was held on Monday at the Royal Institution, Albemarle-street. The Right Hon. Frankland Lewis presided. From the report of the auditors read to the meeting it appeared that the total income during the past year was £13,228 5s. 7d., and the expenditure £12,858 15s. 9d., leaving £367 8s. 10d. cash in hand on the 31st December, 1843. The assets, including £10 643 9s. 7d. invested capital, amounted to about £12,000; and the liabilities to upwards of £3000. The report stated that the removal of the animals at the gardens to better ventilated dens and cages, and the absence of artificial heat, had contributed greatly to improve their health. The honorary officers of the institution were then balloted for, and the meeting separated.

THE JEWS' HOSPITAL.—The annual dinner of this charity took place on Tuesday evening, at the London Tavern, Bishopsgate-street. About 200 gentlemen were present. The chair was filled by Martin T. Smith, Esq. in the absence of his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, from indisposition. Grace was then said by one of the readers in the Synagogue. "The Health of Her Majesty the Queen," and the customary toasts on public occasions, were given successively, and duly honoured. The principal toast, "Prosperity to the Jews' Hospital," was then given. The object of the society's bounty were introduced to the company. Those employed in learning handicraft trades each carried a specimen of his work, which was inspected by his friends and patrons during the progress round the room. The chairman, in proposing the toast, stated in a few words the design of the charity, which was instituted for the relief of the aged poor of the Jewish persuasion, and for the education and employment of the youth of both sexes. The sum subscribed to the funds, during the evening, amounted to upwards of £1000.

THE TWOPENNY POST DELIVERIES.—On Wednesday morning the twopenny post letter carriers insinuated pretty strong at the General Post-office, and the branch offices, as the new regulations for the extension of the deliveries throughout the metropolis came into operation. There are now ten deliveries in London instead of seven, viz.—8, 10, 12, A.M., 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, and 8, o'clock.—P.M.

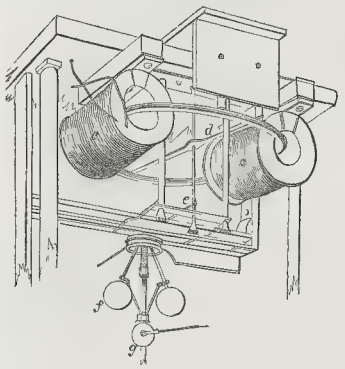
THE WILL FORGERS. On the arrival of the prison van at the Millbank Penitentiary, with convicts from Newgate, on Saturday morning, among whom were Barber, Fletcher, and Sanders, the former, as soon as he alighted, was seized with a fit of tremor, which lasted some time. On his recovery, he was taken, with his associates, and placed in separate cells, in the eastern wing of the prison, which is considered the most healthy. They have each of them a bible, prayer-book, and a few religious tracts allowed them to read. On Sunday they attended divine service in the chapel. Barber appeared to be labouring under great anxiety of mind, and now believes that his friends will be able to procure a commutation of his sentence. Fetcher seemed more resigned to his fate, and paid great attention to the service. It is believed that he will not live to be several days in the country. He has not made any disclosures relative to the forgeries, as was anticipated last week. Sanders feels deeply his situation, knowing that his wife is suffering for the same offence in another prison. She and Mrs. Fletcher have been transferred to the county prison to undergo their sentence. A transport ship is fitting out at Woolwich for the reception of convicts, which is expected to be ready in a few weeks, when Barber, Fletcher, and Sanders will be sent on board with about 200 more.

RESPITE OF MARY FURLEY.—On Saturday afternoon, about four o'clock, we are happy to say, the sheriffs received a communication from the Secretary of State for the Home Department, stating that her Majesty had been graciously pleased to respite the sentence of death passed at the last session of the Central Criminal Court on Mary Furley during her Majesty's royal pleasure. When the respite arrived at Newgate, four of the aldermen of London, and a number of Parliament, distinguished for his philanthropy, were present, anxiously awaiting the result of their exertions. The moment the important information arrived, it was at once communicated to the wretched woman by the ordinary of Newgate and other official personages. The poor creature, on receiving the information that life would be spared, burst into a flood of tears, and when she had somewhat recovered her self-possession, expressed her gratitude in the warmest terms to the gentlemen who had so kindly interested themselves in her behalf.

LEARNED DICTION.—A contemporary speaks of a lady who astonished a party the other day, by asking for the loan of a diminutive argentous truncated cone, convex on its summit, and sempserforated with symmetrical indentations, or, in other words, a thimble.—The Quebec Gazette.

ELECTRIC PRINTING TELEGRAPH, SOUTH WESTERN RAILWAY

The application of electricity as a means of telegraphic communication, though but recently brought into use, was conceived and effected twenty-seven years since. It remained, however, for the construction of railways to bring this new telegraphic system into practical operation. As one of the marvels of modern science, it seemed almost unsurpassable; but, its utility promises to be vastly extended by adding to the apparatus the means of recording the results by printing, and thus accomplishing by a power placed at some miles distant, a labour which, but a few years since, could only be performed by direct manual exertion. Henceforth, as "quick as thought," will scarcely keep its place among our home similes: for, so various is the application of electricity becoming to the purposes of every-day life, that, hereafter, our "household words" may be allowed to take a tinge from this scientific standard.



DEFLECTING APPARATUS.

To Mr. Alexander Bain is due the merit of discovering that an effective voltaic battery may be formed by employing the moisture of the earth as the exciting fluid; and that at whatever distances apart, the generating plates may be placed, an electric current is formed when communication is made between those plates by an external conducting wire. The principle is thus lucidly described in "The Artisan" for the present month; and Mr. Bain has applied this interesting discovery to work his electric printing telegraph; and the success of the invention has been such as to leave no doubt of the efficiency of these telluric, never-ceasing currents of electricity in telegraphic communication. A printing electric telegraph, worked in this manner, has been placed experimentally on the South Western Railway, from Nine Elms to Wimbledon, a distance of six miles; and for that distance, with a single pair of plates of zinc and copper, of but one square foot surface, the electricity generated is more than sufficient for the purposes required. This invention is pregnant with improvements of such mighty consequence, that, by aid of illustrations, we shall endeavour to describe the modus operandi of Mr. Bain's extremely ingenious apparatus.

The Electric Printing Telegraph, then, is remarkable alike for the simplicity of its construction, the admirable precision of its movements, the rapidity of its signals, and the accuracy of its printing process. Such is its velocity, that when this telegraph shall be laid down the entire line, the time occupied in the transit of a message, from Nine Elms to Portsmouth, and receiving the answer in town, will not exceed two minutes and a quarter. The machinery which forms this almost incredible feat, is neither ponderous nor complicated; it consists neither of a multiplicity of wheels nor of immense batteries, nor inclined planes, nor stations fixed at intervals on hills, nor powerful telescopes to descry the signals at a distance; but of a small machine, fixed on a sort of stool table, as shown in the lowermost illustration. Two instruments, precisely similar, are placed, one at Wimbledon, the other at Nine Elms; the only connexion between them being a single copper wire, conveyed in a thin layer of asphalte. Beneath or near the machine, at Nine Elms, imbedded in the earth, and attached to the apparatus by a copper wire is a plate of copper; and, in like manner, at Wimbledon, a plate of zinc; and these, with the action of the earth's moisture, form a natural battery, complete the electric circuit, and cause the telegraph to perform its various functions.

COPPER STATION, NINE ELMS.

Having thus described the apparatus generally, we shall proceed to the details illustrated; premising that it is worked altogether by the gravitating force of two large weights; electricity being employed merely as the agent for setting the apparatus in motion and stopping it at the points required. This is effected by the deflection of a permanent magnet, the apparatus for which, together with the printing machinery, dial, and alarum, are here engraved separately. When a communication is to be transmitted from either end of the line, the operator detaches the hand b from the dial, where it has been fixed by a metallic connexion; and the electric circuit being thus broken, the wire coils cc (in the uppermost engraving), both at Nine Elms and Wimbledon, deflect, and by causing the verge d to move, set at liberty the arms e, which causes the governor-balls f to rotate; whilst their divergence, by centrifugal force, releases the levers, &c., and allows the various parts of the machinery to perform their offices. By this time, the hand of the dial having reached the required figure, the operator presses down the point a to the tube of mercury beneath it; the circuit being, thus completed, the hands of both machines are stopped instantly, and the governor-balls by collapsing, depress the end of the lever g, and set the printing apparatus going: the "snail motion" spindle h makes one revolution, the spring i then presses by means of rods k, the type cylinder l, against the double riband s, (previously saturated with printing-ink, and dried), and thus prints a corresponding figure to that pointed to on the dial, upon the cylinder of paper p, simultaneously at each end of the line. This cylinder is moved forward a little by a crank, immediately a letter is marked; it has also a spiral motion, by which means a fresh surface of the paper is successively presented to the type. If for any purpose, a special copy of the signal be required, a slip of paper is inserted between the ribands, and is thus printed at the same time on the cylinder.

Mr. Bain has also adopted the very useful precaution of an alarum, or notice to the attendant, of a message being printed: this consists of a coil of wire, n (much the same as is used in clocks on the Continent,, and which, by means of a pin catching a wheel, and a spring, forces the hammer, m, forward, and strikes the wire, thus producing a sound as distinct as a bell, but of a much more mellow and musical tone.

The electric printing telegraph has already been inspected by our eminent scientific men, as well as by the members of the Administration, the Lords of the Admiralty, &c. The invention bids fair to be adopted, not only as a means of railway and commercial communication, but to answer the great ends of Government in naval and military operations and movements.

We may here remark that upon one authority, "The Illustrated Polytechnic Review," the current by which the telegraph is worked is due to the oxydation of the zinc. Others, (the conductors of "The Artisan") refer it to the electricity generated by the earth itself, which they consider as the most important feature of the invention, as the principle is capable of extensively valuable applications for other purposes. "The small surface of metal required to excite sufficient electricity to work the telegraph is truly surprising. In the course of experiments to determine the extent of metallic surface which would be requisite, Mr. Bain ascertained that four square inches of copper and of zinc would be sufficient to work the telegraph between Nine Elms and Wimbledon. The current, it is true, was too feeble for practical purposes; and the surface of metal actually employed is one square foot at each station. The extreme sensitiveness of the apparatus to the action of feeble currents of electricity is owing, in a great measure, to an ingenious arrangement made by Mr. Bain, for augmenting the effect on the permanent magnet."

ZINC STATION, WIMBLEDON.

PRINTING APPARATUS.

It should be explained that the trial station of the above telegraph is at Wimbledon; but the ultimate telegraphic terminus will be at Portsmouth; and the time occupied in transmitting intelligence from Nine Elms to Portsmouth will not exceed, in any appreciable degree, that which is at present employed between the trial stations.

OPENING OF THE BRISTOL AND EXETER RAILWAY.

The opening of the entire line of this railway was celebrated on Wednesday. In Exeter all business was suspended, and thousands and tens of thousands flocked in from the country; and the streets, paraded by bands of music, were densely thronged with people in holiday attire.

At nine o'clock the members of the Temperance Society assembled, accompanied by three bands and numerous banners and cars. Having formed in order of procession, they proceeded through the different streets of the city, and thence to a field adjoining the terminus which occupies that space of land which lies between the Red Cow turnpike-gate on the Cowley-bridge-road and Sandy-point, on the east side of the Exe. The site of the terminus is very beautiful, commanding a very extensive view on each side of the road.

By the opening of this line, there is now an uninterrupted communication, westward from London, of 194 miles, 118 of which belong to the Great Western Company; the remaining 76 miles being the length of the Bristol and Exeter line. The whole line exhibits the usual characteristics of Mr. Brunel's consummate skill—substantial works and first-class ingredients. The principal engineering difficulty encountered being in that part of the line opened on Wednesday—the White Rail Tunnel.

At about one o'clock the special train from Bristol, bringing the directors of the Bristol and Exeter Railway, arrived at the terminus. It was propelled by two locomotives, decorated with flags and banners, and almost immediately after the special train from London brought the directors of the Great Western Railway, Sir Thomas Acland, Sir John Y. Buller, and Mr. Divett, M. P. for Exeter. They were received by the Mayor, High Sheriff, and a number of gentlemen who have acted as a committee for conducting the arrangements for the festival.

The banquet was laid in the luggage-shed, a building 160 feet long and sixty feet broad, which was floored over and commodiously fitted up for the purpose, accommodation being provided for 850 persons. Five tables extended the length of the room, and a dais connected three of them at the head, in the centre of which the Mayor, Sir. H. H. Hooper, presided as chairman, supported on either side by the following gentlemen and gentlemen:—Earl Fortescue (Lord-Lieutenant of the county), Lord Courtenay, M.P., Sir John Y. Buller, Bart., M.P., Sir Thomas D. Acland, Bart., M.P., Mr. L. W. Buck, M.P., Gen. Sir J. Dufton, Ld. Gifford, Sir T. Drake, Bart., Sir R. W. Newman, Bart., Sir J. Kennaway, Bart., Sir J. T. B. Duckworth, Bart., Lord Exmouth, Colonel Fulford, Mr. S. T. Kekewich, Mr. C. Gordon, Major Northcote, Mr. A. Stowey, Mr. M. E. N. Parker, Colonel Hopwood, Mr. H. J. Cartwright, High Sheriff of Devon, Sir W. Paterson, Knight, Sir W. H. Tonkin, Knight, General Hall, &c. By special invitation the Directors of the Great Western and Bristol and Exeter Railways, the Mayor and Recorder of Bristol, and the committee of the House of Commons on the South Devon Railway Bill, were all amongst the distinguished guests at the banquet.

After the cloth had been removed, the usual loyal and patriotic toasts were given, which were followed by others in allusion to the progress and opening of a line of railway between Exeter and London. The evening was spent in the greatest harmony, and the meeting separated at a late hour, highly gratified with the proceedings of the day,

THE DOVER RAILWAY TERMINUS, NEAR THE BRICKLAYERS' ARMS, OPENED ON WEDNESDAY.

The addition of this station to the South Eastern Railway was, unquestionably, necessary for public accommodation? A great proportion of the persons who visited the station at New Cross, showed their desire to avail themselves even of a distant point, rather than encounter the inconveniences and loss of time arising from passing through the city, from or to the west end of London. By the above extension, the obstructions of the crowded streets are avoided, and the line is easily and speedily accessible. Another most important reason led to the opening of this station. The limited extent of the one at London-bridge, the hospitals, buildings, and streets contiguous, and the vast cost of removing any part of them for the enlargement of that establishment, rendered the carrying on a goods and cattle traffic impracticable. Hitherto, the attempts of the Company to develope the resources of the country traversed by the line have been seriously cramped. Cattle and produce have, indeed, been attempted to be discharged from their transit at New Cross and Cold Blow Farm, near that station; but the distance from town, and the occupation of the whole premises of the Company during the last hop season, rendered the carrying on of business in this way almost impossible. It will presently be seen that the arrangements for all such purposes are now extensive and complete.

Mr. W. Cubitt, the engineer in chief of the line, judiciously selected the site of this station, which is a most advantageous one, being clear from buildings, and near the Bricklayers' Arms, a travellers' resting-place, long established, and made familiar from all coaches proceeding to the south eastern districts stopping there to receive passengers from the west parts of London. The natural character of the land on which the new station is erected had previously prevented all building operations; but the engineer's skill and the capitalists' means have overcome the formidable obstacles presented by marshy surfaces and sluggish streams, and the whole site is now completely drained and well ballasted.

The area of the station itself, between Swan-street, at the angle of which and the Kent-road the public enter, and south-eastward from the Grange-road, is immense; being nearly four times as large as the area of Lincoln's Inn-fields; and though much of it is covered by the buildings required for the accommodation of the public, and a new course of trade, a very large site still remains for the extension of the station when it shall be called for.

The entrance from Swan-street, or the Screen Entrance Façade, is formed of piers and iron-gates of massive, but elegant design. On passing these gates, the station presents a noble frontage, having a north-westerly aspect. It is constructed throughout of light yellow bricks, faced with stone; and the entire façade is crowned with a bold cornice and embladature, enriched in a novel and effective manner, by a course of red Venetian tiles; and in the centre is a picturesque clock and bell tower, the former of which is illuminated by night. The style has been called Italian; it might be designated more properly an English railway style, being designed by the architect, Mr. Lewis Cubitt, to meet the peculiar circumstances of the case, and merely decorated with Italian forms.

The front is divided into five great compartments. The central one is pierced by three gates, fitted with open arabesque gratings; through these the central carriage-sheds are gained, and therefore the horses and carriages of the nobility and gentry proceeding to the country or the Continent will, by this means, reach the trains. The central compartment is flanked by elegant pavilions on each side; joined also by corresponding screens, pierced in double arcades; provided with three doorways, and protected from the weather by canopies of Venetian tiles, supported by rich consoles. The left hand pavilion, the one to the north-east, is appropriated to the booking-offices and the travellers' apartments; and the one to right or south-west, to the offices for parcels and luggage. The arcade on the right is the one which travellers pass on their arrival, after leaving the trains; and that on the left gives egress to persons departing on their respective journeys. This latter arcade differs, however, from the former, in being the entrance to a splendid Doric colonnade, built of Bolsover limestone, by which the whole of the traffic offices of the station are reached. The entrance lobbies under the canopy lead to the first and second-class pay-offices, and right and left to the colonnade, or the departure platform, for the convenience of passing through the passengers' luggage, forming, together, about 38ft. in length, and 10ft. 6in. in breadth.

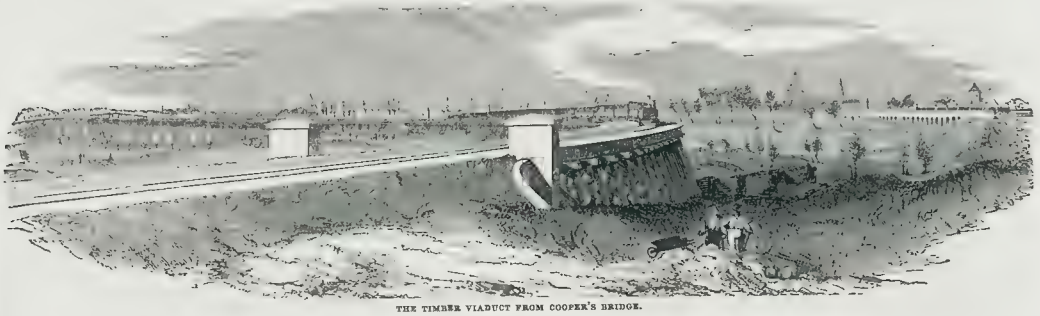
The first and second-class pay offices occupy a space of about 44 feet by 34 feet, and connected with them are spacious waiting-rooms. At this point an open and spacious public way is formed from the colonnade, to pass luggage forward to the platform. Other conveniences are added, then offices for the superintendents and porters; after these a spacious hall, as a pay-office for the third-class, communicating with waiting rooms. The whole extent of these offices is about the same as the colonnade, 246 feet in length, but they are, exclusive of the width of that, 37 feet. The general distribution of the great features of the building is very ingenious, giving breadth and variety to the whole design, and subserving the convenience of the establishment. The surface of ground occupied by the station, offices, covered lines, platforms for the arrival and departure of passengers, and the covered carriage-way, is very extensive; the length being about 420 feet, and the width 215.



THE TIMBER VIADUCT FROM COOPER'S BRIDGE.

Passing on to the offices adjacent, a long brick building, with an iron roof, in size about 310 feet by 52 feet, appears, which is to be appropriated to the shelter of railway carriages kept in reserve. Further onward is an engine-house for spare engines, about 60 feet by 51 feet; on the outside of this is an immense turn-table, sufficient to turn the engine and tender at once; and then a tank, always charged with an ample supply of water, determines the series of buildings at this side of the line.

On the arrival side, and near to the end of a platform, is a carriage waiting-room, and a long dock is closely connected for receiving carriages and horses.

Beyond this are six spacious warehouses, nearly 400 feet in their whole length, and 60 in width, with a roof of open carpentry, with turn tables, raised platforms, and gateways to each front of the buildings, to admit of town waggons. The access to these warehouses is from separate entrances from the Kent-road. Beyond these buildings a large surface is laid out, with convenient landing docks for receiving sheep and cattle, and another separate avenue to the High Kent-road, for their departure to the markets of the metropolis.

After walking over the whole of this station, the writer came to the conclusion, that a space approximating to ten times rather than four times the size of Lincoln's-inn-fields would better approach the extent of the provision that has been made at the Bricklayers' Arms station, for public purposes.

The buildings have been arranged and completed under the direction of Mr. Lewis Cubitt, whose architecture at Dover, Folkestone, and some other places, has shown how well Italian features may be adapted, where great strength, simplicity, and economy, should be most seriously considered.

The builders were Messrs. Grissell and Peto; Messrs. Fox and Henderson have executed the bulk of the iron work.

On leaving the station for a journey, the rails—of stiff and weighty structure, by which smoothness of transit is obtained—sweep to the left, and again to the right, by gentle inflections, till, at the distance of half a mile, they reach the Grange Road, where a handsome flat bridge of three openings, crosses the line. Proceeding thence, they take a straight course to Roll's Bridge, a timber-work structure, built in the American manner, in which a certain rude elegance is attained at small cost. Thence, turning to the right, they proceed the remainder of their course on a wooden viaduct, and by a bold curvature of about a mile in length, and of gradual ascent from the Bermondsey level, to the New Cross embankment, and reach the main line at Cooper's Bridge, just beyond its junction with the Greenwich Railway. This viaduct, the work of Messrs. Grissell and Peto, combines great lightness of appearance and economy of materials with prodigious strength, at a tithe of the cost of an embankment, or brickwork arcade. The whole of this remarkable structure has been subjected to Payne's anti-dry-rot process, by which it is not only protected from vegetable decomposition, but from any contingencies of fire, to which it might be subjected from the falling on it of ignited coals from the engines, as they traverse its surface.

On Wednesday morning, at a quarter before eight o'clock, this branch railway was opened, with due ceremony, to the public.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, MAY 4, 1844.

THE event of the week in Parliament has been the production of the Budget—that comprehensive burden annually opened by the Chancellor of the Exchequer for the information of the people, as to what they are to pay and what he is to receive as the "ways and means" of the ensuing year. The present financial scheme is not a bad one, if we compare it with those of some preceding years, which exhibited lamentable deficiencies, only to be palliated by hope and supplied by borrowing. Thanks to the Income-tax, Mr. Goulburn meets the House with a self-satisfied complacency—not amounting to exultation, but not divested of that certain subdued satisfaction peculiar to those "well to do" in money matters, and placed, for the present at least, above the necessity of applying for "accommodation." Our Governments have been too much and too often under obligations to the Bank of England, not to make the absence of the necessity of drawing on it, a sort of relief to financial anxieties. This is particularly felt by Mr. Goulburn, for, with an anticipated surplus of revenue over expenditure of £3,146,000, he prefers placing that surplus to increase the balances in the Exchequer to applying it for the purpose of remitting taxation. Some small portion of it is thus applied certainly, but it is to so few articles and so small an amount that the remission will be scarcely felt. The equalising the duties on flint and bottle glass, and the repeal of the duty on vinegar will be of advantage only to certain manufactures; the public in general we fancy will not be much benefitted; a slight fall in the price of pickles will be scarcely perceptible. The reduction of duty on marine insurances is most commendable. Any tax on any kind of insurance is bad, as it acts as a check to foresight and prudence. We hope yet to see such taxes abolished altogether, on fire and marine, and policies. The reduction of the duty on foreign coffee by the amount of 2d. a pound, is most important for the principle it involves. Even more to be approved is the increase of duty on chicory, which is used largely for the adulteration of coffee, and the consequence of which is that the public is drugged with a bad, if not a deleterious article. We do not see why the Government should permit any article to be imported that is manufactured and sold for another, or why it should not be as strict in providing that coffee should be unadulterated as tobacco. The concession made in favour of foreign free grown sugar closes the list of the Chancellor of the Exchequer's reductions. One thing in his statement is to be regretted; it is evident from what he says that the Income Tax will not cease at the expiration of its three years; it is hinted -only hinted -that it is likely to be continued for five—two years beyond its term, and even then we fear its repeal is very problematic. We observe that there is a disposition to call this impost a Property Tax. This is disguising its real and its most objectionable character. It is a tax on Income, from whatever source derived. The most uncertain and the most variable are taxed the same as the safest and most unchanging. A real Property Tax is one of the most just that can be imposed, if properly collected; but a tax on Income, by treating all alike, by placing the surgeon, the artist, the men of all professions, whose gains are uncertain and wholly depend on reputation and health, (the most variable of all things), on a level with the landed proprietor, commits the grossest injustice, and as such ought to be condemned and opposed. The omission of any assurance as to the modification and duration of the Income Tax is the great fault of the Budget of 1844.

THE House of Lords has taken a step in legislation this week of great importance. A bill, introduced by Lord Cottenham, on the Law of Imprisonment for Debt, was read a second time on Tuesday evening. The power of imprisoning for debt was always a questionable one, and before the law was modified was absolutely cruel and oppressive, as it made no distinction between misfortune and fraud, all being treated alike. Its machinery also furnished large profits to the harpies of the "profession," who thrived and fattened on writs and arrests, and all the complications of the process. Improvements have been gradually introduced, though slowly and unwillingly assented to by the Legislature, which still retained all kinds of distinctions between different kinds of debtors. Lord Cotteham's bill is intended to remove these distinctions, to simplify the law of debtor and creditor, to assimilate the law as it relates to bankrupts and insolvents, to abolish imprisonment for debt, but giving to the creditor greater facilities for obtaining from the debtor what the law calls a cessio bonorum, or delivering up of his property for the satisfaction of his debts. If debts are contracted without a prospect of being able to pay them, the new law will treat them as fraudulent transactions, and the persons incurring them may be tried before a jury, and punished. The future property of insolvents is to be exempted from the power of former creditors, in the same manner as that of bankrupts is at present, and all proceedings in bankruptcy and insolvency are to be assimilated and conducted in one court, and before one set of judges. The bill is strongly supported by the highest authorities of the law; the Lord Chancellor, Lord Campbell, and Lord Brougham, have spoken in favour of it, and it will, no doubt, become the law of the land.

SIR JAMES GRAHAM is an unfortunate legislator; the bills he introduces or supports are pretty sure to meet with some fatality. We need not allude to his Factory Bill, which is still pending, with two defeats recorded against him. He has just drawn on himself another defeat, which he seems almost to have sought, so needless was his exposing himself to it. A Mr. Miles volunteered his assistance to amend the laws that affect the relation of masters and servants; but so obnoxious were most of the provisions, that a strong feeling was raised against it. We admit that the support the Home Secretary gave to the bill was not very strong, but it was enough to expose him to a decided defeat on the motion of Mr. Duncombe, on which the Government was, on Wednesday evening, in a minority of 43. We cannot account for the penchant Sir James Graham exhibits to connect his name and advocacy with the most unpopular measures.

TRAFALGAR-SQUARE has this week been thrown open to the public. Its terrace, paved area, and fountains, are novelties, and we are glad to see so much done for the embellishment of so advantageously situated a locality. But it is a pity, also, that so much remains to do. The works have been in progress for several years, and the place is opened now unfinished, and with much to detract from the appearance of what is already completed. The cisterns are empty, and the fountains are among the things to be, while the base of the column is to be disfigured for an indefinite period with a wooden inclosure, dirty and unsightly, and still further improved by the usual short but emphatic warning to bill-stickers. This is not the way in which public improvements should be carried out; "they manage these matters better in France." All that has been done is lessened in beauty and value by what is left imperfect. We are not alone in our feeling of dissatisfaction at this lame and tardy progress, and it is with approval, if not with pleasure, that we quote the following mingled description of the improvements and censure on those who have the management of them, from a correspondent of the Times:—

> The most elegant and complete square in Europe, with its massive and finely-chiselled granite, from Aberdeen and Devonshire, by Messrs. Grissell and Peto; its elegant terrace of red and white Mansfield stone from Nottinghamshire, altered into the Italian fashion, and its balustrade and Portland stone, and laid by Mr. Mowlem; its handsome fountains and fine jet of water; its area of seven-and-thirty thousand feet, laid in bitumen, by the Bastienne Bitumen Company, inlaid with bands and a star in white Portland cement, by Messrs. Mauffe; all these various productions, each of the very best description, will be disfigured and disgraced by another unsightly board, because the column which has been placed in Trafalgar-square to Sculpture here, cannot be finished for want of funds; and thus is everything in this country done—we never complete anything properly in the first instance, and doubtless in this, £10,000 must be voted to erect the steps and place the lions at the base of the column at the public expense.

For bills were severally submitted to the meeting and confirmed. After some brief remarks from proprietors, questions were proposed to the directors, and from the replies it appeared that the Salisbury bill was not likely to encounter further opposition. Only one landed proprietor had opposed it, and he had merely expressed his satisfaction at the change of the clauses on which his opposition was founded. It was therefore anticipated that the bill would quietly pass through all its future stages. With respect to the Epsom branch, it was observed that the bill had been submitted to the same committee under whose consideration the proposed line from Epsom to Croydon would be brought. A shareholder remarked that the bill for the improvement of the station, and for the New Cross Hill, would be productive of considerable advantage to the company. It was also stated that with respect to the Newbury branch no further opposition was expected from the Great Western Railway Company. The business having been brought to a close, thanks were voted to the chairman, and the meeting dispersed.

SEIZURE OF 2310 GALLONS OF BRITISH SPIRITS AT MESSRS. SMITH'S DISTILLERY, AT WHITECHAPEL.—Suspicion having been excited that spirits were sent from the above distillery to be rectified at a higher strength than legally allowed, Mr. Drunkwater, a supervisor of Excise, proceeded on Wednesday evening to the above premises, and, on examination, found that a large stock, just about to be sent away, was considerably above the legal strength, and the answers to his questions not being satisfactory, he expressed his determ nation of seizing the stock, consisting of 21 puncheons, and containing 2310 gallons of plain British spirit. A waggon having been procured, the whole was conveyed to the Excise warehouses in Broad-street, to await adjudication by her Majesty's commissioners.

FATAL ACCIDENT.—An accident, attended with disastrous consequences, occurred on Thursday afternoon at Newton Don, the residence of Lord John Scott. As his lordship's valet was out shooting rabbits upon the estate, his fowling-piece accidentally exploded while getting over a fence, and its contents penetrated his body. The unfortunate man in a short time afterwards expired.

DREADFUL ACCIDENT FROM VITRIOL.—On Friday, as a cart laden with vitriol was passing down Ludgate-hill, one of the carboys, or large globular bottles, containing the vitriol, burst, and the destructive liquid was dashed over the horses, burning it in so frightful a manner, that blood flowed from the poor animal in torrents, and it had to be destroyed. The vitriol, as it ran down the horse's sides, and along the street, foamed like boiling liquid in a vat. The driver had a narrow escape SUPPOSED MURDER AT HAMPTON-COURT PALACE.—A sensation has been occasioned at Hampton-Court Palace and its environs, in consequence of the discovery of a portion of the mutilated remains of a new-born infant at the mouth of the common sewer wh ch runs from the Palace into the Thames. Parts of the body were, on Wednesday evening, taken to Mr. Baker, the surgeon to the Lunatic Asylum, at Pelsey, and he is in his opinion that they had been about a week in the water, but whether they were the remains of a live or still-born child he could not state.

SUPPOSED BATTERSEA MURDER.—Notwithstanding the most vigilant means have been adopted by the police authorities to discover the retreat of the wretched man Daimes, no clue has yet been obtained, and the impression that he committed suicide by drowning himself soon after committing the bloody deed is now very generally entertained.

SINGULAR COINCIDENCE.—Yesterday (Friday), a young man of respectable appearance, and genteelly dressed, attended an auctioneer's offered for sale a great quantity of silver plate, at the shop of Mr. Jones, pawnbroker, in Holborn. He had gone in and enquired as to the best way of selling old plate, as his mother had a quantity which she wished to dispose of. A round leather case containing a silver cup and plate, a great number of silver desert and table spoons, &c. As the whole of the plate had crests and arms upon them, the pawnbroker began to make some inquiries of the young man, and gave him custody. Before the magistrate he said, that he had been to Eton College, where his father was a cook, and had received the plate to take to his sister, at Gravesend. He had left it, however, a considerable time before he appeared in the Government Police Gazette, detained a burglary in the house of the Rev. Mr. Hodgson, at Cookham Dean, near Maidenhead, and giving a description, to the remotest nicety, of the property found on the prisoner, he was committed for trial on Monday, when the Rev. Mr. Hodgson will appear, and he will be despatched to Maidenhead.

POLICE.—BOW-STREET.—ATTACK ON MR. EVERETT, THE AMERICAN MINISTER.—On Thursday, about half-past four o'clock in the afternoon, Alexander Sutherland, a Scotchman, was brought up in the custody of Inspector Partridge, A division, by whom he was conveyed from Queen-square police-office, charged with using threatening language to Mr. Everett, the American Minister, drove to the court in his carriage, with two female servants, and being admitted into the magistrate's private entrance, the parties were ushered up stairs, where the depositions were taken, the substance of which was that the prisoner had been in the complainant's service about twelve months, as footman, and received his discharge about a month back in consequence of his determination to get tee-total, or even temperance principles. He afterwards applied for a character to Mr Everett, but as he could not add sobriety to his merits, the prisoner felt offended, and repeatedly called at the mansion, No. 46, Grosvenor-place, and delivered in the domestics messages of a threatening character for their master; in addition to which, he wrote to his Excellency, menacing him with threats and violent language. The prisoner was unable to contradict the material evidence, and he was ordered to put in bail, himself in £100, and two sureties in £50 each, to keep the peace and he of good behaviour for the next twelve months. The required sureties could not be procured, and the prisoner was conveyed to Tothill-fields Prison.

ROYAL BOTANIC SOCIETY OF LONDON.

The spring exhibition of this society was held on Tuesday at the inner circle of the Regent's Park; and, taking into consideration the early period of the year, the show was extremely the finest of the kind we have ever witnessed. A limitation of the rarity and forwardness of the specimens for exhibition succeeded in attracting the attention of Royalty. Her Majesty and Prince Albert, attended by the Marchioness of Douro, Colonel Buckley, and Colonel Bouverie, had, before the public were admitted, a private view of the plants and flowers. The weather was beautifully fine, and the grounds were crowded by a numerous and fashionable company.

The show consisted of an abundance of large and showy specimens of orchidaceous plants, roses, azaleas, rhododendrons, heaths, and pelargoniums, of the most brilliant colours. The azaleas, as might be expected from so sunny a spring were complete masses of bloom Of the orchideæ two were particularly admired, the cyrtopodium punctatum, from Leigh Park, Hampshire, having in its foliage the appearance of a palm loaded with thousands of speckled flowers in branches, and [illegible] a breadth of from three to four feet; and aerides Brookii, an elegant well grown plant, beautifully scented similarly to the aerides odorata.—One of our engravings represents the interior of the principal tent; the other shows the refreshment room in the ground.

The roses were all in pots and remarkably fine, so much so as to attract general attention, being more like the productions of June than of April. Rosa aristata major, among the heaths, obtained and richly deserved the first prize.

The Duke of Norfolk, president of the society, with the Marquis of Northampton, and the Marquis of Exeter, were present, and with other members of the council, accompanied the royal party through the grounds during their visit.

We subjoin a list of some of the prizes awarded by the judges:—Collections of 40 stove and green-house plants—First prize, Mr. Hunt; second prize, Mr. Catleugh (nurseryman); and third prize, Mr. Clarke Collections of 20 stove and green-house plants—First prize, Mr. Stowe, of Twickenham; second prize, Mr. W. WRECK OF "THE WATERMAN" STEAMER, OFF HASTINGS.

THE "WATERMAN" STEAM-BOAT (NO. 10), OFF HASTINGS.

On Saturday afternoon this gallant little craft met with the following serious accident off Hastings. It appears that she arrived at Dover from Ostend early in the morning of Saturday, and left that port about noon on a pleasure trip to Hastings, having on board a party of the directors of the company, Mr. Penn, the engineer, and several other gentlemen. She arrived at Hastings about half-past two, and in passing the town unfortunately too near in shore, struck on a dangerous reef off the Priory, known as the Castle Rocks, which she passed over, and injured her bottom. It being found that the water was flowing fast into her, she was put about, and run on the sand off the Parade, where she filled as the tide flowed, and at high water the hull was covered. A quantity of empty casks were slung round her during the evening, by means of which she was got further in, and on Sunday she was pumped out, and had her leaks stopped. She has since floated off, and been removed opposite the Priory stade for the purpose of undergoing repairs.

The extraordinary performances of this steamer, belonging to the Watermen's Steam-packet Company, have lately excited considerable interest. She is only 107 feet long, was built by Messrs. Ditchburn and Mare, and carries two engines of sixteen horse power, constructed by Messrs. Penn and Son, of Greenwich; left Woolwich on Thursday, the 25th ult., on a trial trip, with coals for five days' consumption, and ran down to Margate in four hours and fourteen minutes; afterwards, she crossed over from Margate to Ostend, against a strong head wind, in five hours and twelve minutes. On Saturday she came from Ostend, and reached Calais just before the Princess Alice left for Dover; she then laid too for the latter; and, starting with her, quickly outstripped her larger competitor, when the latter hoisted two sails to the wind, and in return walked past the Waterman, and entered Dover Harbour only two minutes before her. The Alice performed the distance in one hour and forty minutes.

CHESTER RACES.—Tuesday.

The first race came off at a little after three o'clock, the last a few minutes before seven—a disregard of one of the cardinal virtues of the turf—punctuality, that might have been serviceable to the proprietors of the drinking-booths, but was anything but agreeable to those in the habit of attending Newmarket, Liverpool, Goodwood, and Ascot. The Trial Stakes not having filled, the racing commenced with Leader, Mr. Loder. Conductor, Mr. Potter.

Never, perhaps, was the room of the Philharmonic Concert more densely or critically crowded than on Monday last, and never, perhaps, with better cause for such effect. Paganini come back again (in the person of Sivori), and the purest and most impassioned tenor of our day (Salvi), were quite enough to excite the enthusiasm which appeared on the occasion. We have already chronicled the merits of him who has inherited the mantle of the arch-violinist; we will only say now, that never upon any former occasion, in our hearing, did he perform so beautifully. Of the tenor Salvi's singing there are scarcely any adequate terms to describe its beauty. He possesses a voice of extraordinary extent, with the utmost purity and sweetness of tone, whose soul-touching quality, if he were mere sound and nothing else, would reach the heart, and excite it. Added to this, he is the most finished vocalist we have ever listened to, and a dramatic declaimer of the most energetic and powerful passion. The concert-room is not his proper place—the stage is where he most brilliantly distinguishes himself. The romanza which he sang in the first act, "Ciel Pietoso" (the composition of Verdi, a young composer of Italy), was most enthusiastically encored. We never saw delight so pictured on the faces of all around us, as during Salvi's performance of this exquisite morceau.

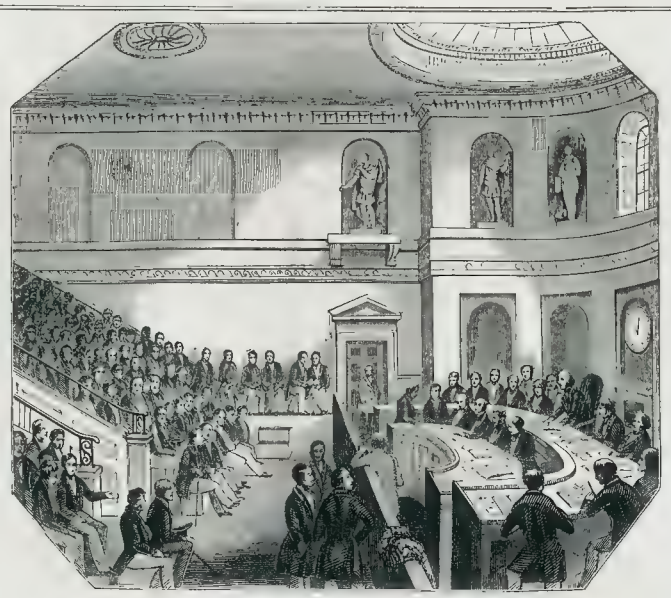
Enthusiasm kindled up once more
In aged eyes, and young ones wept their joy!



COURT OF PROPRIETORS, EAST INDIA COMPANY.

It was a delicious abandonment to art, feeling, and nature. The air he sang in the second act did not afford him such ample room to display his captivating powers. Pacini is but a sorry composer. It is strange that this great singer never found his way to Paris or London before, or is it that the Italians, with real good feeling, unlike all other nations, kindly foster the genius that springs up in their own country?

Lorenzo Salvi, was born in Ancona, A.D. 1810, and, as soon as his juvenile studies were completed, and his voice matured, became the favourite tenor in all the principal theatres in Italy. Perhaps no man has ever "played so many parts in his time." It is said that, at a very short notice, he could appear in any one of fifty or sixty, a repertoire that very few other vocalists can boast of. What a pity we cannot hear him on the Italian boards!—but we must not be too greedy.

The instrumental portions of the concert were executed with that precision and eclat which distinguish the Philharmonic performances; they were led most admirably by Mr. Loder, and conducted in an unostentatious, yet controlling style, by Mr. Potter, who, in the absence of Mendelssohn, took the baton on the occasion. "Haydn's No. 10" (one of his best works), was deliciously performed. "Beethoven's No. 7," also, was as startling and as fresh as ever—the charming movement in A minor being, as usual, encored. Altogether it was a delightful concert, the more so because everybody seemed delighted. Mendelssohn will arrive in time to conduct the next concert.

Madame Dulcken has inserted the following in a morning journal:—

SIR,—You will much oblige me, by adding to what you said about "Spohr's Quintuor," that I performed the same at the Philharmonic Concert on Monday last, at the urgent and repeated request of the Directors, and that I acceded to their request much against my own judgment and inclination.

I remain, Sir, yours, very obediently, MARIE LOUISE DULCKEN.

Bravo! Madame Dulcken! You know how to distinguish good from bad; for there never was greater musical rubbish than the said quintett, which, it appears, you were forced to play.

THE EAST INDIA COMPANY

In our first page will be found an engraving of the Court of Directors, with an outline of the administration of the affairs of the Company. We now annex a view of the General Court Room. Its east side is occupied by rows of seats, which rise from the floor, near the middle of the room, towards the ceiling, backed by a gallery, where the public are admitted; on the floor are the seats for the chairman, secretary, and clerks. Against the west wall, in niches, are six statues of persons who have distinguished themselves in the Company's service: Lord Clive, Warren Hastings, and the Marquis Cornwallis occupy those on the left; and Sir Eyre Coote, General Lawrence, and Sir George Pococke those on the right. It is understood that the statue of the Marquis Wellesley will be placed in the vacant space in the middle.

The meetings of this Court have much the appearance of those of the House of Commons, and its discussions are conducted by nearly the same rules. The Chairman of the Court of Directors presides ex-officio, and questions are put through him as through the Speaker. There is occasionally a display of eloquence which would not disgrace the Senate, though more frequently, perhaps, the matters debated are hardly of sufficient general interest to produce so much excitement. Amendments are proposed, adjournments are moved, the previous question is put, the Court rings with cries of "Hear, hear," "Oh, oh!" &c. &c., and a tedious speaker is coughed down as effectually as he would be on the floor of the House of Commons. At the conclusion of a debate, the question is often decided by a show of hands; but if any proprietor doubt the result, he may call for a division, when tellers are appointed, and the Court divides accordingly. In especial cases, any nine members may call for an appeal to the general body of Proprietors, to whom timely notice is sent, and the vote is by ballot. The meetings always take place at twelve o'clock, and generally close at dusk. In cases of great interest they are much later; and in a recent instance the debate continued until two o'clock in the following morning. The number of members of the Court of Proprietors, in 1843, was 1880, of whom 333 had two votes, 64 three, and 44 four votes. In 1835, there were 2063 proprietors. In 1779, when all owners of stock amounting to £500 had each one vote, and none had a plurality, the number of proprietors was 953, of whom 812 held stock to the amount of more than £1000 each. The Court of Proprietors elects a Court of Directors, frames bye-laws declares the dividend, controls grants of money exceeding £600, and [illegible] to salaries above £500. It would appear that the executive power of the Court, having been delegated to the Court of Directors, may be considered as extinct; at least, it never now interferes with acts of Government, although instances have formerly occurred where acts of the Court of Directors have been reversed by it. Its functions in fact are deliberative; they have the form of all those public meetings in the English constitution, and its resolutions are supposed to be respectfully attended to by the Directors, and even by the Legislature. It is always called together on any proposition in Parliament likely to affect the interests of the Company. It may, at any time, call for copies of papers or documents to be placed before the body for deliberation and discussion; and is empowered to confer a pension, or approbation, pecuniary or honorary, on any individual whose services may appear to merit the distinction, subject, however, to the approbation of the Board of Control, in cases where the sum shall exceed £500.

In No. 43 of our journal we gave engravings of the Exterior of the East India House, the State Procession of the Governor General, and the Palace at Calcutta, with other illustrations of peculiar interest at the present moment.

"THE UGLY BUCK."

This extraordinary winner of the 2000 Guinea Stakes at Newmarket, possesses unusual interest; he has stood the hottest fire for the Derby all through the winter, and the mystery of his movements and powers has raised public curiosity to high pressure.

He is considered by good judges to be the best conditioned and best trained horse ever brought out by John Day; he stands a little over, has ugly top ears, long thighs, and great strength; his colour is a beautiful bright bay. He is, however, in his general appearance, by no means to be compared to Rattan, whose portrait we shall present to our sporting friends next week.

The race at Newmarket is thus described by a contemporary:—After one false start, which was occasioned by Alarcon, the lot got off well together, and in a moment The Devil to Pay shot to the front, and obtained a lead of five or six lengths; The Ugly Buck was, however, soon at his quarters, and Wadastra colt well up with the latter on the near side, the rest following as well as they could. At the Bushes The Ugly Buck reached The Devil to Pay's shoulder, whilst Wadastra colt lay about half a length behind his stable companion. At this point it was quite evident that the race lay entirely with The Devil to Pay and The Ugly Buck, and as well did the former look that the only impression on the minds of the bystanders was that there would be The Devil to Pay amongst the Bucks at the finish. Down the hill they went with no perceptible change in their relative positions, but on reaching the Bottom The Ugly Buck was "persuaded" to get his head to the front, and after a good shaking he managed to beat The Devil to Pay by a neck!

THE MAGAZINES FOR MAY.

MARTIN CHUZZLEWIT, ever paramount among the "periodicals" of its day, in the present number, XVII., devotes a large portion of its pages to one of grand attraction—a dinner in chambers Tom Finch and his sister, and John Westlock, and a tender scene between the two latter—tea drinking, love, and mad ess—and the terrible end of Montague by the hand of Tom Pinch—a most powerful incident. In the first chapter occurs this admirable metropolitan sketch of Tom's sister in the temple—

"Weather there was life enough left in the slow vegetation of Fountain Court for the smoky shrubs to have any consciousness of the brightest and purest-hearted little woman in the world, a question for gardeners and those who are learned in the loves of plants. But, it was a good thing for that same general yard to have such a delicate little figure flitting through it; that it passed like a smile from the grimy old houses, and the worn flagstones, and left them duller, darker, sterner than before; there is no sort of talk. The people human might have leaped up twenty feet to greet the spring of hopeful maidenhood, that in her person sole on, sparkling, through the dry and dusty channels of the law; the chirping sparrows, bred in Temple cornices and crannies, might have held their peace to listen to imaginary skylarks, as so fresh a little creature passed; the dingy boughs unused to droop, otherwise than in their puny growth, might have bent down in a kindred graciefulness, to shed their benedictions on her prayerful head; old love letters, shut up in iron boxes in the neighbouring offices, and made of no account among the heaps of lonely papers into which they had strayed, and of waste, in their decrepitude, they flamed up, and must have burned and flushed with a moment's recollection of their ancient tenderness, as she went brightly by. Anything might have happened that did not happen, and never will, for the love of Ruth.

The portrait of the laundress, "a fiery-faced matron in a crunched bonnet, with particularly long strings to it hanging down her back," and the dinner brought in an obtuse boy, are full of the exquisite humour of life in chambers. Miss Pecksniff a love-making to Moddle, and Mrs. Gamp's tea-making are somewhat broad and stagey; Jonas's proposal to shut up old Chuffey, the clerk, lest he should tell him "what Mrs. Gamp is mentioned to him," will awaken "special wonder." The opening of the next chapter carries with it a terrific interest

"Did no men passing through the dim streets shrink without knowing why when he came stealing up behind them? As he glided on, had no child in its sleep an indistinct perception of a guilty shadow falling on its bed, that troubled its innocent rest? Did no dog howl, and strive to break its tether in pain, that it might tear him; no burrowing rat, so-suing the work he had in hand, cease to gnaw a passage after him, that it might hold a greedy revel at the feast of his prowlings? When he looked back, and saw the corpse-like face, did no grave footsteps stir, fall dry upon the dusty pavement, or were a-ready most and clog on to the red mire that stained the naked feet of Cain

Such questions [illegible] the murderer's own breast-stricken wretch will take him a truer insight, even before he reads the scene of the murder:—

"As the sunlight died away, and evening fell upon the wood, he entered it. Moving here and there a branch or two lying on a bank strewed across his path, he slowly disappeared. At intervals a narrow opening showed him passing on, or the sharp crashing of some fewer branch denoted where he went: then he was seen or heard no more, except as the moon came up, or heard by mortal ear; one man excepted. That man, parting the leaves and branches on the other side, no-ar where the path emerged again, came leaping out soon afterwards. What had he left within the wood, that he sprang out of it, as if it were a hell? The body of a murdered man. In one thick solitary spot it lay among the rotten leaves of oak and beech, just as it had fallen heading down. Stopping and sinking among the leaves that formed its pillow; coming down in a the boggy ground, as if to cover itself from human sight; forcing its way between, and through the curling leaves, as if to one ourselves things rejected and forsworn it, and were moved up in obedience to some dark, dark sense, and stayed and scented the whole summer night, from earth to heaven. The door of this deed came leaping from the wood so fiercely, that he cast into the air a shower of ornaments of young leaves, torn away in his passage, and fell with them upon the grass. But he quickly gained his feet again, and keeping unconcern-d a hedge with his body bent, went running onwards in the road. The road was [illegible] a rough track, and led on towards London.

The straws at which the sinning wretch catches are thus fearfully shadowed forth—

"He began to believe the body never would be found, and began to speculate on that probability. Staring off from this point, and measuring time by the rapid hurry of his guilty thoughts, and what had gone before the bloodshed, and the heaps of incoherent and disordered images, of which the constant prey, he came by day light to regard the murder as an old murder, and to think himself comparatively safe, because it had not been discovered yet. Yet! When the sun went behind into the wood, and left it with the dying light of man's face; but when on that man alive, and sought to win him to one thought of Heaven, on its going down last night!

We need scarcely add that this is an excellent number, and such as to make us regret the approaching close of the work.

THE ILLUMINATED MAGAZINE is redolent of the month in the "Clovernook Chronicles," and a legend of exquisite humour; "A Ramble in the Country;" "A Gossip about the Months;" "A Thief a Flower G ri, and "May Day," are irregular lyric. These are seasonable and pleasant papers fitting for a May number. Captain Canadon has contributed a piece of pleasant gossip about the superstitions of sailors. The "Levy Darmon" of Miss Touliana has a [illegible] story, "Life Behind the Counter, or, the Draper's Ass stant;" and Mrs. Pe-ons treats us with "Sketches of the Boys of Paris," illustrated with a most life-like portrait of a Gamin. Altogether, the number is spirited and attractive, and the engravings are full of interest and clever execution.

SYLVESTER SOUND, PART VII., is occupied with Love and Parliament, and is full of lively incidents, and we think Sylvester's accumulation is not the least amusing. We have only room for the following passage on ignorance, which exhibits considerable knowledge of the world most assuredly expressed:

"Ignorance is universally ignorant, and yet ignorance itself is universal. There is nothing more fiercely denounced than ignorance: yet, in general, they are most ignorant who denounce it most fiercely. All men are ignorant, and yet unabashed is not a man of whom you have knowledge, but mere is not conscious. Ignorance is comparative. There is not a man breathing who does not know something of which every other man breathing is ignorant. The great art is to conceal our ignorance, and that is daily work. To conceal that which constitutes the germ of knowledge—nay, the man who endeavours to conceal his ignorance, is nearly in possession of a most important branch of human knowledge—the knowledge of himself. Ignorance is a means to an end, and we have a talent for the display of their ignorance. Such men are ignorant of their ignorance, and are consequently much to be pitied. To be ignorant of one's own ignorance, to be in the dark of your own darkness, is what most men are involved The common answer, "I don't know," is candid, but it is at the same time a very impossible manifestation of ignorance—and yet where is the man who knows every thing? There is no such a man upon earth. The lowest species of ignorance is that which prompts a man to think that he knows everything; and the highest case of knowledge is that which makes him feel that in reality he knows only this—that he knows nothing. There are, however, men who are expected to know every thing; but of this expectation disappointment must always be the fruit. The our greatest men — men of the mightiest minds — men most highly distinguished for wisdom—how ignorant they are of those common things with which common men are conversant. A journeyman barber would curl his lip, and look with feelings of contempt upon a friend or a cut by an astronomer his astonishment doubtless would be, "He must be a hignoramus as cut this earl!" Nor is it unworthy of belief that there is not one statesman in a thousand, either native or foreign, who knows how to cut a pair of short gaiters. Place Wellington and Napier in the kitchen, and Gunter and Ude in the field, and what consummate ignorance would be displayed by them al: But this true ignorance is applied with more indiscrimination than a y other. A is said to be ignorant by B, because he happens not to know that which B knows, a fact he knows that of which B himself is ignorant. Tom thought the clerk at the police office remarkable, because he professed not to know exactly how to spell "bea-tiful;" he thought the surgeon ignorant; he thought the officers ignorant: indeed, the only man in court whom he imagined to be wise was the doctor; and yet the doctor, as will be seen, was, as far as the practices of penny a-Liners are concerned, one of the most ignorant men there."

THE THEATRES.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

To bid farewell to what we most approve—
To seldom see the object that we love are certainly two hardships which can fairly rival in painful infliction the celebrated Italian triad of miseries, commencing with Aspettar e non venire, &c.

Bellini's melodious and deeply sentimental opera of "Norma," was performed on Tuesday evening last, as it was said, for the last time this season. We could say to the entrepreneur "Crudel, perche?"—and Mozart's "Don Giovanni" was performed for the benefit of Carlotta Grisi, for the first and only time, perhaps, during the season. We have already, in a former number, stated the unwillingness of Italian vocalists to appear in this chef d'œuvre of Mozart; but, be that as it may, it is generally selected once or twice a season to secure (which it certainly does) a good house. The cast was similar to that of last year, with the exception of Favanti, who performed the part of Donna Elvira, an ungracious rôle, in which, however, she acquitted herself most admirably. Mario sustained a little out of sorts, and did not sing "Il mio tesoro" half so well as he did last season. The ballet of "La Esmeralda" followed, in which Carlotta Grisi bade farewell, for the present, to her English admirers amidst the most enthusiastic applause.

DRURY LANE.

On Tuesday evening the performers at this theatre were for the benefit of Miss Rainforth, when a well-filled house bore a most gratifying testimonial to the high estimation, public as well as private, in which the gifted benefactress is held. As a vocalist, Miss Rainforth has fast won "golden opinions" from the hour of her début; but in no instance have her merits been more extensively acknowledged than in her performance of Adrine, in Balfe's opera of "The Bohemian Girl," represented for the seventy-second time on Tuesday evening. On her entrée, Miss Rainforth was greeted with three distinct rounds of applause; and she sang with great taste and spirit throughout the opera, as well as in Elisetta, in the first act of Cimarosa's "Il Matrimonio Segreto." In the course of the evening was given a concert, to which Madame Dulcken, Miss Dolby, Miss Romer, and Mr. Parish Alvars contributed their powerful attractions; and the entertainments concluded with a new divertissement.

LYCEUM.

A pleasant little farce has been produced at this house, entitled "Polkomanis," the object of which, as its name imports, is to burlesque the Polka, which is now moving the head and heels of "all creation." The plot is slender enough: Miss Woolgar enacts a young lady who is dying to learn the Polka; when, opportunely enough, a rattling medical student (smartly played by Mr. Wigan), arrives, and knows the Polka as familiarly with the toes as that the Polka is new medical sysat-m, whereby he will undertake to cure the young lady of ennui. The mama extends to the page of the establishment (natively played by Mr. Keeley); and to a forward soubrette (by Mrs. Keeley, the successor in this line of character): the instantaneous effect of the young couple dancing the Polka was irresistible drollery, as was the old father's dance, with a chair for his partner. The piece was well acted throughout, and, being literally sprinkled with smart things, was very successful. It is the one-hundredth production of Mr. Stocqueler, the author of "The Handbook of India," and, though a mere bagatelle, it shows tact and spirit, and the art of procuring money by the jokes in Nortl Indian. As the subject burlesqued is a very agreeable one, the Polka, at the close of the farcetta, was as much relished as the satire itself.

PRINCESS'S.

On Thursday evening Auber's opera, "La Couronne de Diamans," in which Madame Anna Thillon has been delighting the frequenters of the Opera Comique at Paris, was produced at this house in an English form, under the title of "The Diamond," and the part of Isaure has been rarely paralleled. The chief attraction was the first appearance of an English vocalist, in a part that has won her the hearts of all the Parisians in their language, and which, in her own, captivated, nay, excited her companions on Thursday night to a pitch of enthusiasm which we never saw surpassed. Madame Thillon (late Miss Hunt) is not only a vocalist of the rarest grace, finish, and execution, but she possesses the highest degree of consummate skill and power. The piece cannot very well be said to boast of a plot; let the reader im-ne something between "The Brigand" and "Fra Diavolo," making a heroine of the hero of the latter, and he will have a tolerable notion of the piece. The bandit of a crowded and enchanted audience received more gracefully or modestly. Miss Grant (who sang very charmingly indeed) was also called for, and came forward to receive her due "applaudissements." We shall revert to this opera again more "en detail"—at present our previously urged excuse must stand good, for we cannot get Madame Thillon's exquisite singing and acting out of our head. There was an excellent house, and very much incline to think the theatre will not be large enough to accommodate all those who will very shortly apply for places at any price.

MUSIC.

ANCIENT CONCERTS.

The fourth concert of the series for this season took place on Wednesday evening, at the Hanover-square Rooms, under the direction of Earl Howe, when the following selection was performed:—

PART I.

Chorus, "Gloria in excelsis"	Hummel.
Air, Miss Marshall, "I guiltless blood"	Handel.
Corale (full choir), "O! magnify the Lord" (1597)	Eccard.
Aria, Madame Caradori, "Se pur cara"	Gluck.
Chorus, "Hark! the mighty Hosanna"	Hummel.
Aria, Signor Salvi, "O cara immagine ne"	Mozart
Motet, "How still and powerful" (1555)	Dr. Tye.
Recit. and Solo, Madame Caradori, "But bright Cœlia"	Handel.
Chorus, "The Dead shall live"	Handel.

PART II.

Overture (Oberon)	Weber.

Glee, Miss Marshall, Miss Dolby; Messrs Bennett, Barnsley, and Machin, "Now the jocund morning sings"	Greville.
Aria, Madame Caradori, "I dol mio"	Paisiello.

Madrigal, "Now is the month of Maying"	Morley.
Duet, Madame Caradori and Signor Salvi, "Il bracnio mio guerriero"	Nicolini.
Grand Chorus, "Gird on thy sword" (Saul)	Handel.

Conductor, Sir H. R. Bishop. Leaders, Messrs. Cramer and Loder.

Nothing could have been more delightful than this concert—there was not a single piece that has not some peculiar charm about it, from the mighty Handel down to the pastoral Morley. Hummel's "Gloria" is a most masterly composition, and was magnificently performed. Miss Marshall is most rapidly improving—she sang Handel's song with much expression. The corale which followed, is in the old madrigalian style, pure and beautiful, of course, and Himmel's chorus was truly dignified and impressive. The great attract.on of the evening was Salvi, who sang with most infinite grace and sweetness. He did not once use his falsetto, but poured forth an unconstrained flow of the most melodious chest-vo ce that ever was heard. He was most enthusiastically received. The motet, by Dr. Tye, is a venerable composition, and fills us with that deep emotion that the contemplation of old architecture awakens. Madame Caradori sang Handel's brilliant solo very splendidly, after which, the first part concluded with the same composer's sublime chorus, most effectively.

Part II. commenced with the overture to "Oberon," which was performed in the true spirit of its composition. Miss Dolby sang Beethoven's aria most sweetly. The glee which followed, required, perhaps, a little more rehearsing. Mdm. Caradori sang "I dol mio" very charmingly, and was most ably accompanied on the clarionet by Mr. Williams. Morley's madrigal went, as he would say himself, like a stream of harmony through a pleasant meadow. It is the perfection of pastoral music. Nicolini's duet had nothing particularly meritorious in it, beyond affording Salvi an opportunity of displaying his extraordinary powers. The whole wound up with Handel's chorus, "Gird on the Sword," which, it was whispered about, was selected by the noble director in compliment to the Duke of Wellington, whom Wednesday attained his 75th year. It looked very like it, certainly, for his grace did not enter the room until the chorus had just commenced. There is something too theatrical in this if concerted. The next concert will take place under the direction of Prince Albert, on which occasion her Majesty will be present. The following vocalists have been engaged: Mdme. Caradori, Miss Rainforth, Miss Dolby, Mrs. A. Shaw; Mario, Salvi, Harrison, Pergetti, Maclan, and Lablache! What a host!

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.—Herold's fine opera of "Zampa" is to be resuscitated on Thursday, at her Majesty's Theatre. Fornasari will appear as the Pirate Chief, and thus give to this charming work the dramatic interest and vocal completeness, the absence of which has so much marred the result on the first performance. The personel of Fornasari is peculiarly adapted to the picturesque; the romantic cast of features and commanding figure, assisted by the striking costume, may impart to his appearance the effect of one of Salvator Rosa's brigands. The music is essentially within the register of his massive, yet agile voice, and he has severely studied the character. "Zampa" was the opera which at once placed its composer at the highest point of celebrity as a dramatic writer. It has elicited the commendation of the severest contemporaries, and the delighted approval of the amateur. Persiani will sustain her original character in this opera. Independently of this attraction, there will be a dramatic scene, in which the matured genius of Grisi, and the brilliant voice of Favanti, will be in requisition. Cerito will appear in the beautiful ballet of "Ondine."

DRURY-LANE THEATRE.—Signor Cesare Rossi, the youthful violoncellist (not the least feather in his cap the protégé and favourite pupil of Rossini, appeared at this house on Wednesday evening, and was most rapturously received. His style is a little eccentric, but, perhaps, not the worse for that. He certainly produced some extraordinary effects, and was deservedly and loudly applauded. That is, without doubt, the time for the violin to be in the ascendant—what with Sivori, Ernst, Pott, Joachim, Rossi, cum multis aliis, we are at a loss to say whose pretensions are the highest.

LECTURES ON NATIONAL MUSIC AND TRADITIONS: LOVER'S, HORN'S, WILSON'S, TEMPLETON'S, &c.—When Wilson originated these entertainments, they had at least the charm of novelty; but they have been multiplied of late usque ad nauseam; and yet, if we could abstract ourselves, and believe that each is the only one "in our generis," we might have occasion to praise it, and, by doing so, praise all. We will not make any comparisons between them which might be construed into invidiousness, but content ourselves by saying, "ubi plura nitent"—we will not make any objections, but, pleased with all, recommend our readers to become hearers of their various merits, and judge for themselves.

TROUT FISHING.

To the Editor.

Sir,—In the last number of the "Otter" (called in Scotland "the Lath") was not accompanied by the information to your numerous readers that the machine in question is considered unfair and unsportsmanlike by all fair anglers; not so much from the number of trout it destroys, as those which it leaves with hooks in their mouths, which are consequently rendered shy in taking the fly again. I know many anglers who, from this cause, have given over to the pursuit, as all times has free access, but where the fisherman who uses either otter or net is considered a poacher, and treated accordingly; amongst many waters I may be excused for particularising the lakes in North Wales, in the Penrhyn estate, which are, by the generous proprietor, Colonel Pennant, strictly preserved for all honest brethren of the angle.

PARISIAN FASHIONS.

We quote the following "Modes de Longchamp" from "Townsend's Parisian Costumes" for May:—

The Mores gradually develope themselves in the fashionable promenades, and the new fashions are now to be seen in their perfect state. The corsage will be varied, both high and half high, but plain, the sleeves tight, and either half long or so much as to be merely jockeys (epaulets). With respect to skirts, they will be of the usual fullness of the season, plain or flat, and trimmed with a flounce, or with narrow tucked ruches, or with a deep volant, having a border and heading of a ruche of pleated ribbons, or again with bands of light passementerie (silk gimp), or puckered ribbons placed on ruche round the facings, and descending down each seam from

The TRAINE DRESSES are frequently made of cambeleon taffeta, a silk also well adapted for the corsage in rather high and close bodies, plain and open under the arm à la Grecque, that is, it descends down the outside the arm, over the under sleeve of the same body-lining, which is continued to the wrist.

The BODICES of DRESSES are made with a point in front to show the muslin chemisette, which is always run with embroidery and lace. See the letterpress figure in plate 1032

Pelerines have generally several volans, particularly those made of light materials, they are mostly placed in bands, and commence almost from the waist; the quantity of materials these dresses consume is immense. The wonder élégante is said to be in favour of volans with points or corners, and headed with a ruche (a notched ruche); this style is not only adopted for young ladies, but also for dresses, but not for sleeves, and sometimes for mantelet-sinawls. Rucnes are still in favour for silk dresses for morning.

DOUBLE SLEEVES are now indispensable; that is, a white sleeve appears from under the coloured sleeve the dress is composed of; which latter is wide, and trimmed to correspond with the trimming of the dress.

DRESS PELISSES are sometimes embroidered with silk, and sometimes with braid. Pelerines are only adopted in morning wear for Hats are now rather larger, and more spread out in front; some with brims, others round the border with bunches or tasses of tulle. The favourite colours for hats, capotes, and also for dresses, are pale blue, sea green, stone grey, pale pink, straw, and a very pale Prince Rose.

FANCY STRAW HATS are now very fashionable; as they cannot be considered in good taste without bavolets. (curtains); they make them of the same rubbons they are trimmed with, and which are always of a mixed colour, and placed in bands, or with rosettes at the back of the hats, under narrow bands of straw. These ladies who adopt muslets dispense with all ornament at side their hats. Those who wear their hair in front have a small bouquet of flowers placed on the side with bows.

Some chip straw CAPOTES are composed of tulle, covered with gauze, which is festooned down to each shoulder, and ornamented with ribbons and flowers.

CAPS have the crowns either of lace or blond. DRESS CAPS are ornamented with flowers and no ribbons, whilst DAY CAPS are trimmed only with ribbons.

Flowers are now seldom adopted for the ornament of Hats, but they are employed in profusion for Caps.

Tortoise-shell Combs are worn light but strong, so as not to break the hair or hurt the head, and capable of being worn under every description of Hat or Cap

THE LATE GREAT CHESS MATCH.—It having been announced by the French champion, M. St. Amant, that Mr. Staunton, in his late proposals for playing a match at chess with any player in England, had imposed conditions which he knew were unacceptable to him, our countryman instantly published the following prompt and decisive refutation of the charge, in the shape of a challenge addressed direct to St. Amant himself:—"Sir,—I allege, to the terms of which you have taken so many exceptions, was a genera one, and its conditions however equitable, could never be so nicely shaped that they would coveiai with the wishes and convenience of every individual; they will not do so, it would seem, with yours. Keeping them, therefore, altogether out of view on the present occasion, regarding only the important desire which you express, and which I feel, for another match, and the assurance you have given us of your being in London this spring, I have the honour to submit for your consideration another défi. I will engage, upon your arrival in London this spring, to play you at the St. George's Chess Club, a match of 21, of 18, of 11 of 7, or of 5 games, as your opinion, for any stake not less than £100 each game. These games shall be played at your own appointed days and hours. I will undertake to play every day, or alternate days, or once in a week, as you may determine, under the penalty of forfeiting £50 for each omission. I will accept the minutest time for each move shall be 10 or 15, or 20, or 25, or 30 minutes, at your pleasure; and that either party exceeding the given time shall on every occasion be fined one guinea. I shall also be pleased to be placed in publicity at such hour as you may arrange, and finally, I will consent that in each game both players shall on their first move play king's pawn two squares."

HORSHAM ELECTION.—The election of a member to represent this borough in Parliament, in place of the Hon. Mr. Scarlett, took place on Wednesday in the Town-hall. There being at present no returning officer for this borough, the High Sheriff appointed Mr. Prance as his deputy, to perform the duty. The only candidate in the field was Mr. R. H. Hurst, of Horsham Park, who represented the borough on three occasions, and who possesses very considerable local influence. Mr. Hurst was proposed by Mr. Linfot, seconded by Mr. B. Mitchell, and there being no other candidate, was declared duly elected. The new member is a supporter of Whig policy.

COUNTRY NEWS.

BRIGHTON.—ATTEMPT TO SHOOT A GAMEKEEPER.—On Saturday night last an attempt was made to shoot a man named Carter, a gamekeeper, in the service of the Earl of Chichester, at Stanmer Park. The gun was discharged through Carter's bedroom window, and the bullet or marble, with which it was charged, struck the bed-cord. Suspicion attaching to a man named B——, he had been recently prosecuted by Carter for trespass in pursuit of game, and was then arrested by the police.

CORNWALL.—DREADFUL MURDER.—On Wednesday week an inquest was held before Joseph Hawkey, Esq., coroner, and Mr. Gilbert Hamley, deputy-coroner, in the parish of Davidstow, Cornwall, on the body of Charlotte Dymond, aged nineteen years. It appeared by the evidence that deceased, being employed by Matthew Weeks, left her mistress's (Mrs. Peters) on the 14th instant, about four in the afternoon; they were seen on the moors going towards Roughtor. Weeks returned to Mrs. Peters's without any of the sheep, and when questioned as to where Charlotte was, he said he did not know. On the Tuesday following his mistress said, "I insist on your telling me what has become of the girl." He then said, "If I must tell you, she went to Rowan Willy to close [near] a house last Sunday, and was going to Blisland the following day, as Mr. Lounon had got an easier place for her." On Saturday Weeks met a man named Bethson, who asked him what he had done with the girl. Weeks said, "I don't where she is gone, but if she is found murdered, they will take up her mother for it, for she said she would kill her if she came home again." On the Sunday it was suspected that he had murdered the poor girl, and Mr. Peters and Stevens and her son to search the moors. They went to the moor, and traced her patten marks for some time, but shortly lost them. On returning to Mrs. Peters's they found Weeks had put on his best clothes, and run away. On the following day several people went to search for the de ceased, and, on going down a small bank, they discovered a woman's footmarks opposite those of a man's, but quite close, as if they had had a struggle. About half a gun-shot from this bank, they discovered the body of the poor girl lying on her back, with her throat cut. The wound was eight inches in length, and about two inches and a half in depth. Mr. Stevens, the surgeon, who made the post mortem examination, and it was impossible she could have done it herself, as it was done with such force that it had partially separated the bones of the neck. The jury without a moment's hesitation, returned a verdict of "Wilful murder" against Matthew Weeks, who was apprehended on Wednesday afternoon, on the Hoe at Plymouth, and immediately removed to Camelford.

GATESHEAD.—FATAL COLLIERY ACCIDENT.—On Friday, three deputies were down the pit at Friars Goose, near Gateshead, to keep the workings in proper condition; and at noon, three others went down to relieve them. The former were out, however, at the bottom of the shaft, as they ought to have been. Search was therefore made for them; and they were at length discovered in a part of the pit under Byker-hill, on the opposite side of the Tyne. They had been seated on a rolley, to which an axe was fastened, when they were buried by a fall of stone from the roof. Five hours elapsed before they were got out, and one of them (whose name we have not learned) had to assist in his own liberation by sawing through a block of stone! Another, named William Ridley, was dreadfully crushed, and is hardly expected to recover. The third, John Cadwell (a married man with a family) was killed.

IRELAND.

THE IRISH STATE TRIALS.

THE NEW TRIAL MOTION.

DUBLIN, FRIDAY.

Shortly after the sitting of the court this morning, Mr. Whiteside rose and his argument in support of his motion for a new trial. His speech was strictly technical. At a quarter to four o'clock he concluded, by expressing a hope that he had satisfied the court a new trial should be granted.

The Attorney-General then rose and said there had been separate notices served by all the traversers, and he understood that they intended to have all these notices separately opened, and that the notice of Mr. O'Connell, which had been opened by Mr. Whiteside, should be disposed of before any others should be opened. The course would be a most inconvenient one, and the question was what number of counsel the Court would permit to speak; but whatever the number might be, he would insist that the traversers should open all their notices before there was any reply to them.

Mr. Hatchell said there were four distinct classes of notices.

It was finally arranged that four counsel for the traversers should open them; the Attorney-General then to reply; then four counsel more to speak for the traversers; and then the Solicitor-General to close on the part of the Crown.

Mr. Hatchell next addressed the Court on the part of Mr. T. M. Ray, and at a quarter to five o'clock Mr. Hatchell was still speaking.

SATURDAY.

Mr. Justice Burton took his seat on the bench at half past ten o'clock, and heard some unimportant motions connected with the case. The full Court sat shortly after eleven o'clock, and Mr. Moore, Q C, then proceeded to address their lordships on behalf of the Rev. Mr. Tierney. The duty which devolved on the learned gentleman was a most painful one, but he felt it his duty to say that he has been on terms of the closest intimacy for upwards of thirty years, must have been, to say the least of it, exceedingly disagreeable. Whilst he refrained from charging the learned Judge who tried the Court regretted that the full Court was PARLIAMENTARY PORTRAITS.—Nos. XVI.—XVII.

MR. SMYTHE, M.P.

Since the unfortunate affair of the duel between Colonel Fawcett and Captain Munro, the British public have evinced a most praiseworthy feeling of indignation and horror against those heartless and degrading exhibitions of recklessness of life which are far too frequent amongst those who are looked to as examples of moderation and virtue, and who, although they scorn a mean action, are willing to perpetrate a murder in the name of honour. This current of feeling merely shows how prone men are to let the substance flit by whilst they are vainly endeavouring to catch the shadow; and yet it is only when their victim lies panting or breathless at their feet that they can see, as in a glass, the loathsome charnel house, which, in their sinful impetuosity, they delusively believe to be a hall of diamonds. Such, however, is the realization of the sickly dream, to which your "man of honour" is exposed. That fine and spirited creature, who an hour since was warmed and actuated by the kindliest and most manly feelings of which humanity is susceptible is suddenly reduced beneath the level of the brute creation, by some paltry taunt, perhaps, or idle lie, or despicable insinuation, and which, if not blinded by passion, or emanating from any other source, he would be disposed to regard as a piece of low blackguardism, utterly beneath the notice of a respectable member of society. We have been led into this train of observation by a recent occurrence, in which the subject of our present sketch took a prominent part. In last week's paper, it was our painful duty to record a scene which took place in the British House of Commons between Mr. Smythe and another honourable member of that assembly, and which, but for the dignified manner in which it was put a stop to by the collective wisdom, we would have thought was being enacted in the more congenial atmosphere of an American provincial Legislature. We are far from saying that Mr. Smythe is an unruly or ill-conducted man—quite the contrary; he appears to be, and we have no doubt he is, a very amiable and well disposed young gentleman; but such is the tyrant custom of society, that even this refined, and educated, and humanized specimen of humanity is obliged to assume the aspect of an ogre, and appear willing to imbrue his hands in the blood of a fellow man, whilst, with his natural dispositions, he would risk his life to save the worthless existence of a hound or horse. Our readers cannot forget the cartel sent by Mr. Smythe to Mr. Roebuck, the member for Bath, inviting him to meet him in a deadly conflict, in order that some real or imaginary slight might be avenged in a way that the world would applaud. This, we regret to say, is anything but a wholesome or creditable state of society; and yet we would not be supposed to bear hard on Mr. Smythe, for we are willing to make allowance for his sense of honour and youth, and strong temptations, and we speak "more in sorrow than in anger" when we allow ourselves to condemn him at all. We will not say that at a moment's notice Mr. Smythe would undertake "the command of the Channel fleet," as was humorously observed of another great civilian; but we have no doubt whatever that in a good cause—in the cause of his country—the same spirit which he evinced on the occasion which we have here reprobated, would impel him to fire a mine or lead a forlorn hope.

Mr. Smythe is above the common height, but slightly built, and having all the easy gracefulness of an accomplished gentleman. His age, we should say, is somewhere about thirty, although perhaps he looks younger. He is the eldest son of Viscount Strangford, and was elected for the borough of Canterbury in the year 1840, on the retirement of Lord Albert Conyngham.

MR. FERRAND, M.P.

So much public attention has been of late directed towards the parliamentary conduct and speeches of Mr. Ferrand, the Member for Knaresborough, that we have been induced, at the request of a number of our subscribers, and contrary to our general rule, to give his portrait for the second time. The sketch now presented is considered to be a good likeness of the original, of whom it is unnecessary that we should, on the present occasion, say much, having in the 7th number of this paper given a biographical sketch of him, with such comments on his personal style and deportment, as well as his political tendencies, as appeared to us to convey a correct description of our subject. Mr. Ferrand's popularity in the manufacturing districts was sometime ago exceedingly great, but whether it has been impaired by the recent resolutions of the House of Commons, in which his charges against Sir James Graham and Mr. Hogg were voted "unfounded and calumnious," there has been as yet no opportunity of testing. One thing, however, he may be assured of, that the public will in future expect from him a greater degree of moderation and tone and temper, and a greater respect for the feelings, as well as consideration for the failings of others.

MAY.—A SONNET.

Month of the nightingale, and rival birds,
Who out of her sweet honey-breathing mouth
Would steal or echo all its music-words,
Thou'rt here again, once more from the soft south,
Where thou sojourning hast been since the time
Thou last wert banish'd from our fickle clime!
Yes! yes—thou com'st again as fresh in charms,
As e'er we do remember thee invest
The very rustling of thy pinions warms
And wakes all Nature from a sullen rest!
Thou art like Hope unto an aching heart
Which often bidden by Despair to go—
Will but awhile (and then but seem) depart—
Returning soon new solace to bestow! * W.

* The ill-requited May that bears no thought
Of last year's wrongs in memory, but strews
From out her charitable lap untir'd,
Her blessings o'er this thankless, thoughtless bubble!—Old Play.

ROYAL ACADEMY—PRIZE SCULPTURE.

ROYAL ACADEMY PRIZE SCULPTURE.

For this beautiful bas-relief, 7 feet by 4 feet 6 inches, Mr. Edward B. Stephens received the gold medal at the last distribution of prizes at the Royal Academy. It is an exquisitely classic composition, representing the celebrated battle of the Centaurs and the Lapithæ—

To justify his threat, he thrusts aside
The crowd of Centaurs, and redeems the bride.
The monster nought reply'd; for words were vain,
And deeds could only deeds unjust maintain;
But answers with his hand; and forward press'd,
With blows redoubled on his face and breast.
An ample goblet stood, of antic mould,
And rough with figures of the rising gold,
The hero snatch'd it up, and toss'd in air
Full at the front of the foul ravisher.

NOOKS AND CORNERS OF OLD IRELAND.

SIR WALTER RALEIGH'S HOUSE AT YOUGHAL.

The town of Youghal, which is prettily situated on the banks of the Blackwater, in the south of Ireland, contains several interesting remains of former days; amongst which, there is none more deserving of a visit, or more worthy of being made known than the whilom residence of the once courted, admired, and celebrated, but unfortunate Sir Walter Raleigh. It presents the ordinary appearance of the comfortable manor-house of the Elizabethan era, though it was originally a collegiate establishment, consisting of a warden, fellows, and singing men, founded in the year 1464. In the 17th century, Sir George Carew Lord President of Munster, resided here, and repaired and altered it to its present appearance. In the year 1602, Sir Walter Raleigh came into possession of it, and afterwards sold his interest to Sir Richard Boyle, afterwards Earl of Cork. It is now the residence of Colonel Faunt, who has given it the name of Myrtle Grove, and with judgment and good taste has made any alterations or repairs subservient to, or in keeping with, the character of the building. The walls are nearly five feet in thickness; the exterior is wainscoted all through with Irish oak, in good preservation.

RALEIGH'S HOUSE.

The panels in the drawing-room are elegantly carved, and the chimney-piece is a chef d'œuvre of its kind, of dark polished oak, from the floor to the ceiling, presenting a rich and elaborate specimen of various carving, with various quaint and grotesque devices and ornaments. The roof is also of Irish oak, which appears to have successfully resisted the hand of time. Creepers run up to a considerable height on the outside of the building, and in front and around, are gardens neatly laid out, in which are some very luxuriant myrtles—and hence it has derived its name. It is said that within the precincts of these gardens, Sir Walter first planted the potatoe which he brought from South America. The stranger visiting this retired and interesting spot is struck with the silence and quietude that reigns around, and almost involuntarily gives the reins to his imagination, to muse over the eventful life of this extraordinary man, and depicts him moralizing on the hollowness and treachery of camps and courts, or projecting in his restless and enterprising mind some new voyage to distant climes to return covered with evanescent riches and renown—but the melancholy reality of his last days breaks in upon the dream, and sends the visitor away with a feeling of sadness and regret.

HISTORY OF WOOD-ENGRAVING.

EALTHIER book-buyers appear from about 1616 to 1630, to have chiefly indulged their taste in neat little books, from small 8vo. size to 16mos. ornamented with frontispieces,or title-pages, delicately engraved on copper, while the thin 4to. pamphlets, story-books, and such like, of the same period, intended for a different class of purchasers, were generally printed on vile paper, and illustrated with no less vile wood cuts—as if every printer had been "his own artist." The following extracts, relative to wood-engraving, from John Bates's "Mysteries of Nature and Art," London, 1635, give a curious account of the art as known and practised in England at that period: -

"THE MANNER OF ENGRAVING IN WOOD.—The figures that are to be carved, or graven, in wood, must first be drawn, traced, or pasted upon the wood, and afterwards all the other standing of the wood, except the figure, must be cut away with the little narrow pointed knives made for the purpose. The working is far more tedious and difficult than the working in brass; first, because you must cut twice or thrice to take out one stroke, and when you have cut it so that it may be picked out, yet if you have not a great care in picking it out, you may break out a part of your work, which may deface it. Secondly, because that, in cross-hatches, you must stand picking, so that it would weary one to see one's work go so slowly on; yet a good resolution may in time overcome these and other difficulties that attend thereupon; and for those inconveniences, an artist may find in the practice thereof, this is one commodity he shall gain; he shall be private in his designs, for he himself may print them when they are cut, nor shall they be exposed to the view of every stationer that frequent the housen of common, whereby one receiveth much injury and vexation.

"OF THE CHOICE OF WOOD TO CUT IN.—Box is the best; but walnut-tree, beech, maple, or any hard, close, and well-seasoned wood may serve: let it be cut out and planed an inch thick, and in pieces according as the bigness of your figures do require.

"OF DRAWING YOUR FIGURES UPON WOOD. Having whitened one side of your wood, blacken or redden the blank side of your figure, as I have taught in the Art of Painting, and with a little stick, or swallow's quill, trace or draw over the strokes of your figure.

"OF PASTING YOUR FIGURES UPON WOOD.—Note, that you must not whiten over the wood when you intend to paste the figures, for that will make that your figure shall pill off; only see the wood be well planed, then wipe over the drawn, or printed side of your figure, with gum tragant dissolved in fair water, and clap it, even and smooth, upon your wood, and let it dry thoroughly; then wet it a little all over, and fret off the paper gently, until you can see perfectly every stroke of your figure; then let it dry again, and when it is thoroughly dried, fall to cutting or carving; beware you fret not the figure away in any part when you are fretting it.

"THE MANNER OF PRINTING YOUR WOODEN PIECES.—In the following book of "Extravagants" I have taught how to make printing-ink of sundry colours, to which I refer you; you must also have some wool bound up in a piece of sheep's leather; also a roller, smooth and even, which must have a piece of cotton baize rolled hard twice about it; first wet the paper you would print upon, with a sponge wet with alum-water, then take some of the kinds of ink, and put it upon the leather, and lightly clap it all over the print; then put the paper that you wet upon it, and roll it hard on with the roller, and it is done."

From these extracts it might be safely concluded even if there were no wood-cuts of the period in existence to abundantly prove the fact—that the art of wood-engraving was then at a very low ebb in England; and from books containing wood-cuts, published in countries where it had formerly been most successfully cultivated, it does not appear to have been in a much better condition. For one professing to reveal the "Mysteries of Nature and Art," John Bates appears to have had but an imperfect insight into the arcana of wood-engraving—one of the principal of which is, to have the subject distinctly drawn on the block. As he does not allude to the method of making a drawing directly on the block by means of a pen or a pencil, it would seem that he was ignorant of the process of drawing on wood; the sum of his revelations on the subject consisting of instructions how to make a clumsy tracing or transfer on the block from a drawing or engraving, and how, when the cut is finished, to take impressions by means of a roller. His idea of the "commodity" of the art appears to have been on a par with his knowledge of its practice. He represents wood-engraving as being "far more tedious and difficult than the working in brass"—by which latter expression he means the usual copperplate-engraving, not engraving in brass in relief for the purpose of printing like a wood-cut—and yet to compensate for those inconveniences it has "one commodity," namely, that the artist, who is so skilful as to be able to place a subject on the block by tracing or transferring, may engrave it or print it himself without exposing it to the view of inquisitive booksellers, who are always poking about in printing-offices, and engraver's work-shops, or, to speak in modern Italianate phrase, studios, for, now-a-days, all who have the slightest pretensions to art have "cut the Shop." John Bates, indeed, seems to have mistaken the only peculiar commodity which wood-engraving, according to his own account of it, possesses over "working brass; and that is the facility with which a person who is no artist, may make a tracing or a transfer on wood; for an artist may work on a copper-plate in private, and also take proofs of his work by means of a roller, as well as an amateur may work on and take proofs of a wood-block. A collection of "privately, [and primitively] printed" amateur wood-cuts of the time of Charles I., engraved from tracings or transfers after the method of John Bates, would unquestionably display all the characteristics of "rough proofs."

The best wood-cuts, designed and executed about the middle of the sixteenth century, are to be found in a little book of devotion, the subject of which is Christ's Passion, first printed at Antwerp, in Latin, French, Spanish, and Flemish, about 1646. It was published at a small price—being chiefly intended as a help to the devotion of the poorer classes—and an immense number of copies were circulated, probably in a manner similar to the works issued by modern tract societies, thirty thousand of the Latin and Flemish editions having been printed before those in French and Spanish appeared. There are forty cuts in the book, and many of them contain both the mark of the designer, A. S., and that of the engraver, I. S. I. The drawing of those cuts is extremely bold and free, and will in this respect bear a comparison with most of the cuts, of a similar character, of the preceding century; but though they are not badly engraved, for the time, yet the style in which they are executed is not worthy of the design. These are said to have been drawn by a Flemish artist named Sellerte, who had been a pupil of Rubens.

The latter half of the sixteenth century is remarkable for its dearth of artists. It would indeed be difficult to name a painter or a sculptor of genius who flourished in that period. It would seem as if the old sources of inspiration had become exhausted, and that new ones had not yet been discovered; for whether old time-hallowed subjects or scenes of every day life were depicted, the same want of imagination and of natural sentiment is generally perceptible in all. It was the reign of absurd fashion, and the "Grand Monarque" was Louis XIV., whose full-length portrait—representing him wearing a huge periwig, high-heeled shoes, and the order of the Holy Ghost, and standing in an attitude between the posture of a dancing master in the first position, and the "parade" of a master of fence,—may well stand as the emblem of the kind of art which flourished in his age. At such a period, when good drawing, skilful composition, and natural expression are so rarely to be found in the higher productions of art, it would be unreasonable to look for excellence in wood-engraving. Its productions indeed were then of the very meanest character,—feeble and puerile in design, and coarse or dryly laboured in execution,—in short, they are truly "wooden cuts." A fair specimen of the state of wood-engraving at that period is afforded by the "curious sculptures" which enrich the "precious old quarto" editions of "Reynard the Fox," "Sir Bevis of Southampton," "Robin Hood," and other pleasant histories of the same kind, which appeared between 1670 and 1700, and by the perversely graceless head and tail-pieces which appear as ornaments in other books of the same time. It would appear that the professional wood-engravers were chiefly employed on the execution of such ornaments; while the more wildly daring illustrations of the pleasant histories—"sold with large allowance to chapmen and others who attend fairs,"—were mostly the productions of untutored genius. Until a comparatively recent period, indeed, it was not unusual for country printers to engrave themselves such wood-cuts as they might occasionally require for the illustration of tale or history. When Dr. Franklin first began business as a printer in America, he was accustomed to engrave both his own wood-cuts and copper-plates.

The two cuts given below will afford an idea of the general style of wood-engraving which prevailed in England from the reign of Charles II., to the commencement of that of George I. They are copied from a little book with the following title:—"The Pious Youth's Recreation; containing a Pleasant Historical Relation of the Families of Riches and Poverty, Godliness and Labour. Illustrated with a variety of Pictures suited to their several occasions. London: printed and sold by B. Harris, at the Golden Boar's Head, in Gracechurch-street, in 1711. Price 6d. stitcht, 8d. bound." This little book, which appears to have escaped the notice of all book-collectors and bibliographers, is, in "matter, form, and style," worthy of the genius and piety of John Bunyan, and deserves to be reprinted in the present day. The first cut which we give from it occurs at page 21, and represents

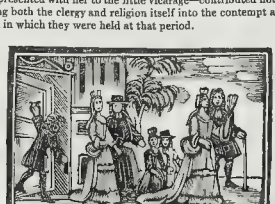
Riches with his wife and children walking out, accompanied by his chaplain and the lady's maid. It may here be observed, by the way, that in the opinion of Dr. John Echard, who wrote in 1670, the disparaging treatment which the chaplain often met with in gentlemen's families—his being seated near "my cousin Abigail" at meals, and being presented with her to the little vicarage—contributed not a little to bring both the clergy and religion itself into the contempt and disregard in which they were held at that period.



RICHES WALKING OUT.

Now Riches having a large house
And sev'ral miles of land,
Maintain'd a numerous family
To be at his command.

The next cut, which occurs at page 28, represents the consequences of the imprudent marriage of Miss Delicacy, the daughter of Riches, and in temper "most like her mother, Jezabel."

And when her mother would prefer
A match to raise her fame,
She took her father's serving man,
One Prodi, al by name.
Like dogs and cats they liv'd some time
In restless anxiety,
And had one only daughter born,
Whose name was Infamy.

About this time, 1710, and for many years afterwards, wood-engravers appear to have been accustomed to engrave subjects, both ornamental and illustrative, on type-metal, in relief, in the same manner as on wood, for the purpose of being printed with letter-press. There indeed appears reason to believe that several of the ornamental head and tail pieces which appear in the books printed by Tonson and Watts, between 1713 and 1720, were executed in this manner, by Edward Kirkall. Many of those ornaments are executed in a clear and delicate style, and prove that the engraver was expert in the mechanism of his profession. Kirkall, who was also a copper-plate engraver, published, between 1722 and 1724, twelve chiaro-scuros, engraved on copper, with a sepia tint printed over them from a wood-block. In 1722, Tonson and Watts published the first edition of "Croxall's Æsop's Fables," with cuts, probably engraved either by Kirkall or under his superintendence, but whether on wood or on type-metal, it is not easy to determine. To the conclusion that they were engraved on wood, from the assumed greater facility of execution on wood than on type-metal, some of the cuts themselves present a very material objection in the fact of certain little marks and flaws being discoverable, which can only be satisfactorily accounted for by supposing that the subjects were engraved on type-metal. Those cuts, whether executed on wood or on metal, are certainly better than any that had been previously printed as illustrations of Æsop, and most decidedly superior to all that appeared subsequently, till the time of Thomas Bewick.

John Baptist Jackson, who was probably a pupil of Kirkall, was certainly one of the best wood-engravers of his time, notwithstanding that his contemporary, John Michael Papillon, a French wood-engraver, mentions him in a disparaging manner, "as having acquired an insipid taste, not above the little nosaces on snuff-boxes, and surcharging his works with ornaments, which, though delicately executed, were deficient in effect." Jackson, probably from want of encouragement in his own country, visited Paris, about 1726, where he appears to have remained for about five years. He at first was employed by Papillon, but, having left him, he, according to the account of the latter, "went the round of the printing-offices in Paris, and was obliged to engrave his cuts without order, and to offer them for almost nothing; and many of the printers, profiting by his distress, supplied themselves amply with his cuts." Jackson afterwards went to Venice, where at first he appears to have been chiefly employed in executing ornamental cuts for the printers. In an Italian translation of "Suetonius's Lives of the Twelve Cæsars," printed at Venice, in 1738, the ornamented border of the title-page is of his engraving; and in the same year he engraved a chiaro-scuro, "Christ Taken Down from the Cross," from a painting by Rembrandt, then in the possession of Joseph Smith, Esq., the British Consul at Venice, but now in the National Gallery, Trafalgar-square, to which it was bequeathed by the late Sir George Beaumont. Between 1738 and 1742, when living at Venice, he also engraved twenty-seven large chiaro-scuros, chiefly from paintings by Titian, J. Bassano, Tintoret, and Paul Veronese. The best of those chiaro-scuros is that representing the Martyrdom of St. Peter Dominicano, from the celebrated painting of Titian; most of the others are but inferior productions, and will not bear a comparison with the chiaro-scuros engraved in the sixteenth century from designs by Andrea Mantegna, Raffaele, Parmegiano, and other Italian painters. It appears that Jackson was induced to engrave those chiaro-scuros from the encouragement of three English gentlemen Mr. Frederick, Mr. Lethuilier, and Mr. Smith, the Consul; who also procured him a subscription for the set, which when finished were published in a large folio volume.

It does not appear that Jackson on his return to England resumed the ordinary business of a wood-engraver, to which, as it was chiefly confined to the cutting of mere ornaments, he might think himself superior after having engraved his large chiaro-scuros. From a work entitled "An Essay on the Invention of Engraving and Printing in Chiaro-Oscuro," published in Jackson's name, in 1754, it appears that he was then living at Battersea, and that he was endeavouring to render his skill in engraving and his knowledge of printing in colours available for the purpose of printing paper-hangings. The book contains eight prints; four of them are chiaro-scuros, and the other four are printed in colours, in imitation of coloured drawings. They are inferior to his other works of the same kind executed at Venice; and were those they otherwise would, in consequence of the paper on which they are printed having become stained by the oil with which the colours had been mixed.

John Michael Papillon, the best French wood-engraver of his time, an enthusiastic admirer of his art, and the first person who wrote a work expressly treating of its history and practice, was born at Paris in 1698. Both his grandfather and his father were wood-engravers, but the business of the latter at the time of John Michael's birth was chiefly confined to engraving blocks for printing paper-hangings. In this branch of the art young Papillon appears also to have been chiefly employed until the decease of his father, which happened in 1723. Both father and son also acted as papier-hangers, as we learn from the following passage in the younger Papillon's "Traité de la Gravure en Bois:"—"When young, being engaged with my father in going almost every day to hang rooms with our papers, I was, some time in 1719 or 1720, at the village of Bagneux, at a Monsieur de Greder's, a Swiss captain, who had a pretty house there. After I had papered a small room for him, he ordered me to cover the shelves of his library with paper in imitation of Mosaic. One day after dinner he surprised me reading a book, which occasioned him to show me some very old ones which he had borrowed of one of his friends, a Swiss officer, that he might examine them at his leisure. We talked about the figures which they contained, and of the antiquity of wood-engraving; and what follows is a description of those ancient books as I wrote it before him, and as he was so kind as to explain and dictate to me."

It is necessary to observe here that the description which Papillon says he wrote out from the explanation and dictation of Mons. de Greder, relates to a series of wood-cuts—which no person has ever since seen, and no person, it is probable, ever saw, before—but was ever mentioned—pretended to have been executed in Italy about 1285, by two twins, named Alexander Aberic Cunio, and Isabella Cunio, between their fourteenth and sixteenth years. The subjects related to the conquests of Alexander the Great; and the youthful amateurs, after the manner of artists in the time of Papillon, had engraved their names, with the customary "Pinxit. et Sculpt.," at the bottom of the cuts. It appears that the interesting memoranda which Papillon made from a personal inspection of those cuts, and from De Greder's explanation, were mislaid for upwards of thirty-five years, but that he was so lucky as to find them before the publication of his great work on the History and Practice of Wood-engraving, which appeared, in two volumes octavo, in 1766, and to which he added a Supplement, in 1768. It is needless here to enter into any lengthy refutation of Papillon's account of those ancient wood-cuts: it is sufficient to declare that a more trumpery story was never palmed upon the world, notwithstanding that it is embalmed as a piece of authentic history, in "Ottley's Inquiry into the Early History of Engraving, and in the "Encyclopœdia Metropolitana" article, "Wood-engraving." As an excuse for Papillon, it may be urged that he had been insane in the interval between his conversation with De Greder and the publication of his book, and that as he was a man of weak intellect, but great enthusiasm on the subject of his art, he may, in good faith, have told for truth that which he had only imagined, or which had been imposed on his credulity for truth, by a retired Swiss Captain, whose want of active employment might occasionally tempt him to indulge in that species of ingénu fraud vulgarly called "hoaxing." Be this as it may, Mr. Ottley and the writer in the "Encyclopœdia Metropolitana" have most certainly got a "bargain."

After the death of his father, Papillon appears to have applied himself more particularly to designing and engraving small cuts for "book-work." He engraved with great neatness, and had a better knowledge of the effect to be attained in wood-cuts, by skilful contrasts of black and white, than any other wood-engraver of his time. He died in 1776; and from the period of his decease, until within very recent times, when it received an impulse from England, wood-engraving made no progress in France.

THE RACE FOR THE CHESTER CUP.

Ict not broils
Ferment from sensual cups.—PHILIPS.

It will be in the memory of most of our readers, that in 1843 dire disputes, and sore dissatisfaction, arose both out of the preliminaries and process of the Chester Cup. It is, perhaps, the most amiable philosophy to let bygones be bygones when they relate to unpleasant events, but if but for the sake of contrast we could not avoid the allusion. True, out of the speculations on the great handicap disposed of on Wednesday last, some matter of suspicion and controversy grew, but as the issue passed the storm and clouds vanished, and gave promise of the brilliant result that followed. A series of transcendant weather brought us to the merry May meeting common to the Rhodites, when, for several seasons, has steadily advanced in popularity both as a pleasure rendezvous, and one whereat no lack of sterling business can be complained of. For the Cup a field of horses had been in the market since the declaration of the arrangements, which ensured large profits to the takers round: the party for whose especial behoof the great sporting handicaps have been established. The committees by whom the leading provincial races are managed, have come to the conclusion that their meetings cannot advance without the aid of the "legs," and therefore they have got up for them these sops, under the guise of handicaps, and hereby the scheme of betting is as nearly as human ingenuity might adopt a system for the relish of human credulity, reduced to a certainty of winning in favour of the hold, whom Fortune loves to succour. To show the working of the system from the instance in hand, for the Chester Trades' Cup in the present season, at least five-and-twenty horses have been backed; considerably more might here be said, but for the sake of our argument this lot is ample enough. Suppose, therefore, that the book-maker had the odds of £100 against each of them, he would have £2700 by this manner, for Red Deer (whose price was 7 to 1 at starting, and he has only recently appeared in the market), and win £2400 by the other twenty-four, leaving a balance in his favour of £1700. There are worse handicrafts in the world than "legging," when it is carried on with spirit, and a good capital—of credit.

On Tuesday Chester races commenced with a good muster; but it remained for the following day—our especial festival—to gather together the greatest multitude ever known within the ancient walls of that most ancient of cities. It was roasting hot with dust and sunshine, and confusion enough to carry by coup de main the hearts of the holiday people, and sufficient excuse, nay, obligation, for a big drink upon Father Ireland had he been present.—If he wasn't, the worse was his luck. The noble arena between the city walls and the Dee, on which the course is situated, was populous with all degrees of humanity a matter of which nicks sight. Soon after four the field for the Cup was duly telegraphed, amounting to twenty-six, among them being some of the best horses in England. The office of starter was undertaken by Lord George Bentinck, and of course filled in a most workmanlike manner. Having written the name of each jockey on a slip of paper, he mixed them together in a hat, observed they all drew, and had their places thereon indicated—whether in the front or rear rank—the manœuvres of the course making it necessary to start so large a field in two divisions. That start was perfect—the whole body of horses going off as if put in motion by machinery. The moment the signal flag fell, the pomps on Red Deer sent in his spurs, cleared his horses, made running as hard as he could split, and thus continuing from end to end, won by at least a dozen lengths—as shown in our sketch of the race. Alice Hawthorn was second—and Nutwith last, having broken down, in which he was joined by Vakeel and the Broken Down. Celeste threw her rider, and then ran against a post, and threw a summerset herself. Bramble was stopped as soon as it was evident the Red Deer was safe, or he would have been not far from second. It was, of course, no race but rather a Red Deer hunt, the field appearing to chase the leader—without, however, the remotest chance of catching him. It was the hollowest thing ever done by an infant of 4 stone over such a course as that at Chester—and two circuits of it to boot.

TATTERSALL'S.

MONDAY.—To dilate upon the quotations in the betting on the Chester Cup, now that it has become a "matter of history," would be mere waste of space. We need only point to the change in the premiership, as a proof that those who selected Bramble as the nag of the Goodwood stable, had been put on the wrong scent. For the Derby the two cracks were at immense favour: all the frees to two and fours to one that could be got were taken eagerly, and there is not a shadow of doubt that both will be much better favourites. At the close no good man, unless he wanted to hedge, would lay above 5 to 4 against Crocky's horse, or more than 7 to 2 against honest John. The other favourites are a cacnount, and the field daily getting weaker.

THE THAMES REGATTA.

Thursday last, the annual meeting of the members of this club, was held at the Bristol Hotel, Cockspur street, for the purpose of announcing the prizes for the ensuing year, and other business. The cour was taken shortly before five o'clock by Mr. Bishop, President, who addressed the meeting, observing that at the last meeting, the fullest hopes were held out respecting very considerable patronage being bestowed on the club. (Hear, hear.) He rejoiced at being able to state that Lord Castlereagh had consented to become President, and that the Lord Mayor had handsomely offered his patronage, and expressed his intention of attending the regatta, accompanied by all the civic authorities. (Hear, and applause.) The chairman, after some further important details, observed that it had been determined to fix the regatta to take place on the 20th, 21st, and 22nd of June. This course, after much consideration, has been adopted, as a dispute had taken place between the club and the one connected with that at Henley, which had also fixed their regatta to take place at the same period. He hoped that some arrangement would be made to prevent the two from being held at the same time. (Hear, hear.)

The chairman then announced the following prizes:—The gold challenge cup, the silver challenge-cup (both for gentlemen), the pair oar silver cups, the challenge sculls' cup, the landsmen's sweepstakes, the prize wherry, the fifty sovs. prize, ten pair oars, the thirty sovs. prize, ten scullers, coat and badge; £100, for four-oared gigs, open to all, excepting those connected with the Thames; fifty sovs. similar race; the gentlemen's eight-oared matches, as usual. All prizes, with the exception of £100 and £50, are similar to those contended for last year.

Several subscriptions were then announced, and entered among them were sums received from several of the metropolitan and other aquatic clubs. Some other business of no importance was then gone through, and the meeting separated. As the further details were given under the account head in a recent number of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, it is not now necessary to repeat them.

It is to be hoped that the Henley Club will postpone their regatta, and not wilfully spoil the metropolitan sports.

CRICKET. The arrival of the month of May usually is regarded as the period at which the manly and purely English game of cricket is introduced for the season, but the unprecedented fine weather with which April has been favoured has, in the present year, induced an earlier commencement of play than heretofore. Already have many of the members of the two universities begun their matches, whilst several of the clubs in the vicinity of the metropolis have, during the last few weeks, been at practice. At Oxford, we learn that two new clubs have been formed, the one by the gentlemen of Exeter, and the other by the gentlemen of Wadham. A new ground has been laid down for the former on Cowley Marsh, at a very considerable expense; and the Wadham members have made a present of new shutters and bats to the city. From appearances it would seem that cricket will be more patronised and more followed at the two universities than in any preceding season. Indeed, so general has the game become, not merely in England, but in all parts of the known world, that it has assumed an interest and an importance little anticipated half a century since. It is not, therefore, that the preparations for play have been confined to our universities, for we find that in every district where it has been heard of, the members of the different clubs have entered the field in addition to the matches which are ordinarily played at the universities between the various colleges, we hear that arrangements are in progress for contests with the far-famed Marylebone Club.

AQUATICS.—Newell, who defeated the five Flemish men in the late celebrated contest, is considered to be the third man as to rowing powers on the river, he having been defeated by the late champion of the Thames, Charles Campbell, and also by Coombes, who accompanied him to Ostend. Since the retirement of Campbell, Coombes has been looked upon as the champion of the river. He has already beaten Newell twice.

DEATH OF ANOTHER STEEPLE-CHASER.—The horse St. Botolph's, the property of Mr. Stokes, which ran at the Tenby steeple-chase on the 8th ult., and subsequently in a private steeple-chase at Haverfordwest, which it won, died a few days since from inflammation, the supposed consequence of a cold caught after the last race.

INDIA AND CHINA.

We have received Calcutta papers of the 6th, and Bombay papers and correspondence to the 19th of March, inclusive, brought by the Bentinck, which reached Suez on the 12th of April; they were brought to Marseilles from Alexandria direct by the French steamer.

The steamer Carnac was despatched from Bombay on the evening of the 19th to Ceylon, to meet the Bentinck on her passage from Calcutta to Suez.

The mails which had left London on the 1st of February had arrived at Bombay, but the letters were not delivered until the following day. The most important military news relates to the refusal of one Madras and two Bengal regiments to proceed to Scinde on finding that they were not to be allowed full batta.

There is nothing of importance from Lahore and Affghan stan, but it is supposed that these two states will shortly come to open hostilities.

The Senates arrived at Bombay on the 16th of March from China, which country she left on the 18th of February, having on board, amongst other passengers, Major-General Sir James Schoroder. The town of Victoria was quite healthy, and it was hoped that the ensuing summer would not be so fatal as the last. Several daring attempts at robbery had been made at Hongkong. Sir H. Pottinger had evinced an earnest desire to act up to the treaty with China. Her Majesty's 55th Regiment was under orders for immediate embarkation for England. Her Majesty's ship Dido, Captain Keppel, left for Calcutta on the 26 of February, having on board Lord Saltoun, late Commander of the Forces, who arrived at Suez in the Bentinck, and will proceed to England by the (Great, Liverpool. Little was doing in teas on account of the high prices demanded.

The Governor-General arrived at Calcutta on the 28th of February, and on the 29th published a most liberal grant of batta to all the troops that were engaged in Gwalior and in Scinde. India in general is tranquil.

The price of indigo has advanced a little at Calcutta, and the business in Bhatan cotton piece goods has been active.

A letter from Calcutta, dated March 15, contains this passage:—"Scinde is finally and for ever annexed to the British possessions."

[From the Calcutta Englishman, Feb. 29.]

The following is a more detailed account, for wh ch we are indebted to a correspondent:—"Four companies of her Majesty's 16th Regi ent were drawn up in line, with their 'right' resting on the Government-house, the eastern entrance to the Government-house. The reserve guards, with their 'left' resting on the same entrance, were drawn up in line also, and facing the companies of her Majesty's 16th Regiment; the whole being thus brought within the Government-house area, drew, and during which time he was received with 'arms presented.' The Light Company of her Majesty's 16th Regiment, in 'single rank,' were drawn up on the steps of the grand entrance, and immediately facing the Government-house Guard; on his lordship alighting from his carriage, he was again received with arms presented, while the Deputy-Governor, &c., advanced to meet him; at the same moment the Royal salute was received from the saluting battery, and a salute of 19 guns was fired. This closed the 'tamasha;' the whole of the civil and military attached to the presidency were ordered out on the occasion."

LIEAKNEY.—A twelvemonth ago Sir Charles Napier, on the field of battle, and after a signal victory, recorded his conviction of the great disproportion of European officers to the native troops, and warned Government of the risk which it ran in this respect. It was naturally expected, that advice dictated by such experience as the battle of Meeanee afforded, in which the loss of half a dozen more officers might have led to the most disastrous results, would have produced some salutary effect on the minds of those who are intrusted with the welfare of the empire. As yet, however, the only result has been to increase that dangerous disproportion. A body of troops, to the number, it is believed, of 6 000, has been added to the Gwalior state, and there are to be officered from our own army; and during the last week the army itself has been increased at the presidency and that of Bombay, to the extent of 10,000 men, without any corresponding increase of European officers. So great, indeed, is the want of officers felt in one arm (that of the Artillery), that the Governor-General has been constrained to remove some officers from important political appointments, which they occupied with much credit to themselves and advantage to the public, and to remand them to regimental duty; and other officers in situations of great political trust have received intimation that, when ever the exigencies of the service may require it, they must be prepared immediately to quit their present posts and join their corps. It is usual, we know, to cast the blame of this deficiency of officers on the parsimony of the Court of Directors, but we do not hesitate to declare that we know of no voice in the practical management of the empire. It appears to exercise no other function but that of distributing the loaves and fishes among its friends and connexions. It is, also, the receptacle of all the pretension of the presidencies, which of little power to redress, and can relieve only by sympathy. Whenever that sympathy happens to be misplaced, which is often the case, it serves to weaken rather than strengthen the cause of a good government. We must not, therefore, look to the Court of Directors for the cause of that unwillingness, which is so justly complained of, to render the army efficient by a suitable increase of officers. It is in Her Majesty's Ministers, in whom the actual government of India now centres, thought such an augmentation necessary for its safety, they would, doubtless, find as little difficulty in persuading the court to issue the necessary orders as the Queen does in prevailing on the dean and chapter to obey her congé d'élire in the election of a bishop. On her Majesty's Ministers, therefore, must rest the censure of this reluctance.

The popularity of Lord Ellenborough appears to be on the increase in Calcutta, where a public meeting was called by the sheriff for the purpose of addressing his lordship on his return from the campaigns in Gwalior.

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE.—FRIDAY.—Since Monday only a moderate arrival of English wheat has taken place for our markets, and the demand for the same has been quite limited. In most descriptions of the article a fair retail business was transacted, at full prices. Free foreign wheat was in good request, and about quite equal to the extent shown in our last report. In bonded grain no transactions were noticed. Nearly 2,000 quarters of foreign barley have arrived this week; yet the greater portion having gone direct to the distillers, the quantity on offer was moderate as by no means large, and prices were supported. Tea.—Some extensive imports of tea have taken place of late, yet the stocks in warehouse are by no means large for the season of the year. The demand for tea arising from the Chancellor of the Exchequer having refused any alteration in the duties—is heavy, at barely late rates. The public sales of 24,000 chests have gone off slowly, and previous rates have been with difficulty supported.

Sugar.—In a descriptions of sugar we have to report an active demand, at an advance on previous figures of 6d per cwt. Standing at 51s to 51s 6d, and fine grocery at 52s to 52s 6d per cwt.

Rice.—In Bengal very little has been doing, and prices are still on the decline. Middling and good white may be had at 10s 3d to 11s per cwt.

Fruit.—Currants are in good request, at 50s to 52s, and new Zante and Cephalonia 48s to 49s. Vostizza fruits, 52s to 53s per cwt

Cinnamon.—The quarterly sales of this article have been brought to a conclusion. The first and second at 5d, first at 1s, but ordinary to middling sorts of Ceylon realising were at from 8d to 1s, second ditto, 2d, ordinary to middling, 3d, and all other kinds 1d to 6d lower

From Scotland only 50 cats came, fresh to hand. The numbers of sheep were but moderate, while the enquiry for them was, on the whole, steady, at full currencies. Lambs —which were tolerably numerous—met a sluggish trade at previous figures The demand for veal was rather active, and the rates had, in some instances, an upward tendency. Pigs

COMMERCE AND MONEY.

The money market has not been so buoyant during this week as we have latterly had the satisfaction to mention, but the nature, reaction resulting from the late advance in the value of all descriptions of Stock in public securities, is the only cause for this circumstance. Since our last publication, the Consols fell about ¼ per cent. and they did not recover from this decline at the conclusion of the transactions of the week. India Stock and Bonds have not been affected by the result of the General Election. On the contrary, they are a shade dearer than we last quoted them. Bank Stock is lower, for which the uncertainty respecting the terms on which the Bank Charter is to be renewed, is a sufficient cause. The shares of the chief Joint Stock Banks in London continue in fair demand, particularly those of the Union Bank of London, which are a per cent dearer.

Large shipments of grain are now making in the harbours we bin and without the Nal re, and large remittances are now making to the continent for payment of this grain. On the Royal Exchange, consequently, during the last two past days, the demand for bills drawn against our export commerce has been considerably increased, and as, at the same time the rates of foreign exchanges has taken place. They are still, however sufficiently high, and the balance of our foreign commerce must continue to be paid in the precious metals, unless our imports add should exceed in value our exports, an event not very probable. The amount of unemployed money, therefore, must at increase, and it continues to make a favourable impression on the money market, in which a fair quantity of transfers has been again made. The London and Brazil, again shares are fully 2 each dearer than they were last week. In those of the Croydon likewise, there has been a small improvement. The Great Western, and Exeter, also are to better demand, and are a ¼ each dearer. The proposed new lines, however chiefly attract the attention of the moment: terest. The shares of the railroad proposed between Carlisle and Glasgow, touching on Dumfries, have this week been in good demand, and they have already commanded a fair premium. The premium on the sum deposited The Chester and Holyhead, the North British and the Ancaster and Sheffield, are also in request, the premium on the former has this week been paid on them. On the whole this department of the money market remains in a sound and healthy condition. In capital is profitably employed in improvements at home, and the labourer's wages are increased by this favourable state of affairs.

On the foreign Stock Exchange extensive business has been again done in all descriptions of Stock or Securities, and, with the exception of Spanish Bonds, prices generally have been fairly supported. For the Bonds of Russia, Denmark and Holland, the export demand continues, and the same remains is applicable both to Belgium and to Spain and Portugal. The home demand also is fully as great as it was last week, both for European Bonds, and for the securities of the new American Commonwealths, the value of all of them being well sustained. The return of speculators has been chiefly directed to the Bonds of Texas, Illinois, and of Mexico. In the former the Bears had now the advantage at the settlement on the 30th ult., and prices at one period declined. Only one new loan has been brought forward some days of the week's transactions. In Mexican Bonds under existing circumstances, the path of peace to confidence, and .ittle alteration has taken place to encourage the prices

No. 106, Vol. IV.] FOR THE WEEK ENDING SATURDAY, MAY 11, 1844. [Sixpence.

CRIME AND ITS CAUSES.

EVEN the most careless must be struck with the saddening details afforded by the police intelligence of the week. It is more than usually prolific in cases of social crime, and the misery that is too often the impelling cause of it. Poverty is at the root of much of this—depravity too must be taken into the account, and when we add to these the joint operation of ignorance, we have three causes at work, which will for ever fill our prisons with criminals, and stain our daily records with tales of misery in its most appalling shapes, and violence in its most terrible forms, in cases of murder and suicide, which, though deplorable to read, it is better that society should know and hear of, in the hope that they may excite some attempt at remedy, than that they should be passed over in silence, and in silence be forgotten.

We seldom remember a heavier catalogue of crime and depravity than has been furnished by the domestic occurrences of the last week or ten days. At the present moment the circumstances of two dreadful murders are brought before the public mind, in the trial of one wretched man at the Old Bailey, and the surrender of another whose trial yet awaits him. In both cases women were the victims; one the wife of her murderer, and the other, from what is yet known, the benefactor of the family of the man charged with the deed. Another case is yet fresh in the recollection of all, in which a woman was sentenced to death, with unnecessary cruelty, for we hope, for the sake of human nature, that the infliction of the sentence would have been an impossibility, for drowning her child in an attempt to put a period to a life of intense misery and suffering. She was driven to the verge of madness by the accidental loss of a few shillings, the slender stock on which she was endeavouring to exercise her industry. A paltry sum, that thousands would squander without even a thought, would in this case have probably saved one human life, prevented the commission of a great crime, and stopped the frenzy of one poor wretch at a point short of utter madness; but the criminal mother is now, we believe, a maniac.

A case painfully similar to the above has just occurred: a man out of work at last obtained a little employment, but having no money to get the materials, raised a few shillings by pledging his tools; but when about to purchase what he required, he discovered he had lost his little all;—the excitement and anxiety of distress became madness, or bordering upon it, and he attempted suicide. The cases are exactly parallel. They are of the class of crimes, or rather miseries, caused by the destitution of all means of living; but equal miseries are often caused by the abuse of competence. Drink is still a fertile source of crime of all kinds, and, notwithstanding the exertions of temperance and total-abstinence societies, and the improved tone of society generally in this particular, we frequently find cases of excess in this despicable propensity, the details of which are absolutely frightful. There is one given in the Times of Thursday that presents a terrible picture of the effects of this vice. The wife of a respectable mechanic was prevented from drowning herself from London-bridge, and her husband appeared to give an account of her when she was brought up at the Mansion-house.

The poor man drew a melancholy picture of the sufferings to which his wife's habits had for a long time exposed him. They had been married 11 years, and frequently had she during that period sold all the furniture, including the very beds, and the clothes which covered the beds. Despairing, after a great variety of experiments, of producing any improvement in her habits in this country, he determined to resign his situation, and to take her and their children to America. Thither they repaired, but the change of climate produced no alteration in those depraved habits which had inflicted so much domestic unhappiness, and he found his condition worse in the place to which he had fled as a refuge than it had been amongst those to whom he was known. He accordingly brought her back and was reinstated by his former employer; but the conduct of the wretched woman became worse and worse, and, alarmed at the example she held out to the children, he determined to let her have nothing except through the medium of the workhouse, to the authorities of which he made such allowance for her as they considered it right to demand.

Here is a case of all peace, hope, and comfort, being banished from a household where the means of enjoying all of them existed! But drunkenness is not the only vice that betrays its continual existence among us by some glaring and extreme proof of that existence; nor is crime, or the folly and profligacy that can be called little less than crime, confined to the haunts of poverty. The rich and fashionable quarter of the town has this week been startled by a visitation of the law, directed against those moral pests—the gaming-houses, which are the haunts of the wealthy fools who seem born for nothing but to be the prey of the needy sharpers. A general attack was made on several at the same time; and to ensure all the success that could spring from surprise, the police themselves were drawn out for "secret service," and not informed by their officers of what was required of them till it was impossible to give warning of the attack. In this the Commissioners exhibited a distrust of their men, which spoke more for their knowledge of, than for their confidence in, them. The caution was commendable, for, that the existence of such dens should be unknown to the police is impossible. From whatever cause arising, the utmost secrecy was observed, and the "drag-net" of the law being thus skilfully drawn, there was a large capture of loose fish, including many of the shark tribe, but the bulk of which were of the gudgeon species. When brought before the magistrate, there seemed an unusual preponderance of the names of Jones, Smith, and Johnson, and the phenomenon is explained by the papers, which state that these plebeian names were given to save others better known, borne by men of rank and station. If these persons have any sense of shame, the present exposure will teach them their self degradation. Gaming is one of those vices, which, when the attachment to it amounts to a passion, levels all distinction; thus these aristocratic Smiths and Jones's are placed at the bar side by side with the scum and refuse of society. As the law, too long careless and slumbering, has at last interfered, we hope it will not relapse into inactivity; and if these haunts of vice cannot be utterly destroyed, let them at least continue to exist in terror and by stealth, that both their keepers and visitors may be in constant dread of the intrusion of the police, and an appearance, in their own persons, at the bar of public justice.

We are not optimists, nor have we much faith in the perfectibility of man; but the impossibility of doing all that could be desired, should not prevent us from effecting all we can. The utter want of self-control, which so many among the poorer classes exhibit, springs from their having had no moral training at all. The same deficiency exhibited among the rich, by the manner in which they abuse the blessings of fortune, arises from their having been cursed—not with the want of education—but with a bad one. Both are evils, and for neither of them do we see any attempt to provide a remedy. The poor struggle up as they can, untaught and uncared for, with no knowledge, and nearly as little religion; and, when temptations and trials beset them, they plunge into debauchery, or seek refuge in suicide. For much of the accumulation of crimes and sorrows of life, the State is accountable, by its total neglect of any provision for the education of the masses that are growing up in the midst of it. Thousands on thousands can be found to build prisons, but nothing can be spared for the schools that might render the prisons needless. The machinery of punishment is ingeniously and horribly perfect; but that for teaching, if it has not to be constructed, requires, at all events, to be put in action. If the police reports of the week were analysed carefully, with a possibility of arriving at an intimate knowledge of each case, though they are more in number, and more serious in degree, than usual, yet ignorance would in all of them be found to have had a powerful influence; and the best use that can be made of so unfortunate an accumulation of crime, is to make it a proof of the necessity of dispelling it. In currency questions and financial operations—in dealings with masses of wealth and heaps of bullion—our legislators forget the poverty that cannot help itself, deeming it, we fear, not worth helping. They may rest assured it is a grievous mistake either in men or ministers.

REVOLT AT HAYTI.

Papers have just been received by the Tweed steamer from the West Indies to the 6th of April, from Jamaica, announcing that 'The unfortunate island of Hayti is again the theatre of insurrection. The inhabitants of what was the Spanish part are in open revolt against the French population, which hitherto had succeeded in maintaining the dominion over the island generally, and are about to set up a republic for themselves. Whether they will be successful remains to be seen. Whatever may be the ultimate result certain it is that it will inflict a deep and lasting injury upon that unhappy country, which years will not repair, if it does not deprive it of its independence altogether, and render it once more a dependent colony. The President has issued a proclamation, in which he tells the revolters, in very bombastic language, that 'I will come among you, ac-composed by the National Guard and the brave soldiers who have contributed to the triumph of the revolution, to listen to their resources; but the other party seem inclined to give him rather a warm reception

Her Majesty's Consul at Hayti has transmitted to the Governor of Jamaica an "Arrêté of the Government of the public, clearing to the vessels of foreign nations, the ports of the Spanish, or eastern, portion of Hayti, on account of the insurrection. The decree commences thus

"Considering that the revolt which has just broken out in the eastern part of the republic is the result of a long and perfidious combination, and, that in from succeeding to the revolution the president has taken from them, the conveniences of this fratricidal plot, have endeavoured to observe the progress of its ... and to seize a favourable opportunity of putting into execution their ... project, &c.—

Hayti is the most fertile island in the West Indies. Its surface is nearly ... extent of Ireland and four times as large as Jamaica. It exhibits a great variety of scenery on rather a large scale; the highest point being towards the centre, where is a mountain-knot, the highest summits of which are stated at 8000 feet. These mountains are nearly covered to the summit with verdure and ... woods, and from them descend numerous streams, which, uniting in four large rivers, bestow extreme fertility on the plains beneath. The coast, which is about 1200 miles in length, has a great number of harbours, one of which, St. Nicolas is six miles long, and is capable of holding an immense fleet.

Hayti is divided into six departments. Port-au-Prince, the capital, is in the west, and is the chief seat of trade in the city is, however, chiefly built of wood, and its streets are unpaved. Port Hayttien, in the department of the north, the seat of the kingdom established by Christophe, was better built, and had some handsome squares. It was destroyed by a terrific earthquake on the 7th of May, 1842. Our engraving represents the place immediately after the awful visitation It is copied from a most effective sketch by Lieutenant W. T. Bellairs, R.N.

It is lamentable to view the country of Toussaint, as Hayti is at the present moment, by civil dissension. Such, however, with few intervals, has been the condition of this beautiful island since the extraordinary change caused in Hayti by the French Revolution in 1791, when the Convention caused liberty and equality to be proclaimed there, and the slaves rose, and massacred or drove out the white and free coloured population. This revolution, with its excesses, soon ended in a military despotism. At length, in 1820, an independent negro state was established in Hayti. According to a constitution promulgated in 1816 Hayti is governed by a President, chosen for life, and assisted by a Legislature, consisting of two houses—a Senate and a House of Representatives. Hereby, Hayti is to be considered as a despotism, the chief being chosen by the army; but some republican forms have been added.

SPAIN.

PARIS, May 7.

The affairs of Spain become each day more interesting, and merit the most serious attention of the public. That unhappy country is, or I am greatly mistaken, on the eve of a serious convulsion. The liberals will risk their existence to preserve the few advantages they have gained by the revolution, and the ... pots will go any lengths to maintain their baneful power, and restore the country to the happy days of Ferdinand VII. Narvaez is a tyrant, struggling to become Dictator; but as ambitious and jealous, is very unfitted to succeed in his presence. It is in the hands of such a man that the destinies of Spain are confided. Narvaez is aware, however, that without the aid of the Clergy, he cannot maintain his ground; he has promised them that not only shall no more Church property be sold, but that which has been already disposed of, shall be restored to them,—the purchasers receiving an indemnity in Spanish Stock! In Spanish Stock! the security so unstable! The unfortunate proprietors must accept, or their lives will pay the forfeiture of their disobedience. Even Bravo hesitated to commit the wild ... dismissed from office.

A new Ministry is now been formed, prepared to obey, and passively follow the orders of Narvaez. It is thus composed:—

Carlos de Narvaez, President of the Council, and Min. ter of War.
Marquis de Viluma, Minister of Foreign Affairs.
Mon, Minister of Finance.
Pedal, Minister of the Interior.
Olivares, Minister of Justice.
... Minister of Marine.

The Cortes ... especiability in the new Cabinet is M. Mon, and it is very doubtful whether he is aware of his appointment, for he is and has been for some time dangerously ill with a brain fever. It is worthy of notice that the name of the Marquis de Miraflores does not appear in the new combination. I am most credibly informed that he was solicited, and gave a rather unceremonious refusal. The new Ministry is already at its wits' end to procure money, there not being a single real in the treasury. Several bankers have been applied to, and it is reported that an offer has been made to advance a thousand millions of reals on the interest arising on each stock for 40 ... months, and the nonacceptance as security for the payment of the interest. The Government are ... [illegible] ... giving up the [illegible] ... tend to ... cleanliness and temperance, and the airy and commodious barracks nearly completed for the soldiers and others, the extent and mortality of the fever will be vastly mitigated.

Three of the pirates concerned in the murder of Dr. M'Kinlay, of her Majesty's 19th Regiment, and the three Portuguese sailors, mentioned some time since, have been tried by the authorities and ordered to be decapitated; and the leader of the gang, having been sentenced to be cut in pieces, escaped the punishment by dying in prison.

Extensive robberies are still being perpetrated at the different ports, despite the utmost vigilance of the authorities. The death of Assistant-Commissary-General Irving is mentioned. He had only been a few weeks on the island, but his health was broken from his long residence on the coast of Africa.

Several shipwrecks have occurred, some of the vessels carrying valuable cargoes. . . . Several notifications for guidance of British merchants and others, have been issued by Sir H. Pottinger, and Major-General d'Aguilar, the Commander-in-Chief of her Majesty's forces in China.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT

HOUSE OF LORDS—MONDAY.

The English Debtors Bill passed through committee.

The Marquis of CLANRICARDE called the attention of the house to the appointment of Mr. O'Brien as a stipendiary magistrate of Ireland, which he censured in very strong terms. He referred to Lord Broughham's attack on the late Government for having offered a judgeship to Mr. O'Connell; but, he contended that there was no parallel between the cases, as Mr. O'Connell, as a lawyer and a gentleman, apart from his political violence, was well qualified to discharge the duties of a judge, whereas Mr. O'Brien had nothing to recommend him for the office of a magistrate. He moved a resolution to the effect, that any individual publishing violent opinions on political subjects, that agitated the country, was not likely to preserve the confidence of the people. Lord WARNCLIFFE defended the appointment on the part of the Government, as it marked their sense of satisfaction at Mr. O'Brien abandoning his support of Repeal, and becoming a proselyte to protect on of the Union.—After a discussion, in which the Marquis of Normanby, Lord Brougham, and the Earl of Hadd ington took part, the motion was put and negatived without a division, and their lordships adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS. MONDAY.

The Speaker having taken the chair, Sir T. FREMANTLE moved for a new writ for the return of a representative to Parliament for the borough of Abingdon, in the room of Mr. S. Duffield, who has accepted the Chiltern Hundreds.

Sir R. PEEL having moved the order of the day for going into committee on the Bank Charter, Lord JOHN RUSSELL interposed to express a desire that an early day might be fixed for considering the subject of the present charge in the government of India. He was then arranged that the Indian subject should be brought on next evening.

The house being in Committee on the Bank Charter, Sir R. PEEL rose to move a series of resolutions respecting that charter and the banking system of the country. He observed upon the extensive effects which the decision of the house upon the matter of these resolutions must produce throughout all the transactions of society. The act of 1833 had given to the Bank a term to expire . . 1855, unless, before August, 1844, notice should be given to the Bank that Parliament meant to deal anew with the subject. The Government had proposed that Parliament should exercise this power of notification. He was sure the house would address itself to the question without party bias; he would even ask, if it were permitted him to do so, that gentlemen would be content for that night to hear attentively, without expressing any opinion, that they should reserve all observations until they should have taken time to consider the suggestions of Government. He adverted to the manifesto put forth by the country bankers; he would not blame them, in a matter affecting their own interests, for having thus solicited the aid of members towards a combined resistance; but he must express his hope that members would deem it their duty to decline that indiscreet-mate invitation. It would be necessary for him, he said, in the first place, to consider the principle of value: because, he feared, there was not a universal agreement as to what really constituted the measure of value. First, he would enquire, what was a pound? and what was the engagement to pay a pound? Surely the word "pound" meant something more than an abstraction; in his opinion, it meant a certain weight of standard gold. Parliament, however, in the engagement of a maker of a promissory note was to pay on demand a definite amount of that metal and nuneness. A real measure of value, in this just sense, had existed till the year 1797, when bank paper became issuable without any convertibility into metal. For some years the subject attracted little attention, until the Bullion Committee of 1810 propounded a sounder theory. That theory, however, was the manufacturers to a great part of the public; and a notion became very general that a pound was merely an abstraction. He quoted some of the current definitions of that time, whose vagueness excited a good deal of laughter. It meant a certain weight of gold, or of silver, shall be worth £3 for the future; and he quoted from the pamphlets now in circulation, particularly from one lately published at Birmingham. It was said, that the change of times required a new standard of value; but just as reasonably might it be urged, that because population had increased, and the railway system widely extended, the foot measure ought henceforth to contain sixteen inches. The reason why an ounce of gold was £3 17s. 10½d. in standard silver, and three ounces and a half in the one metal to the other; and if you meant to give a certain advantage to all debtors, you should do so by way of a direct discount, and not say that an ounce of gold, valuing £3 17s. 10½d. of silver, shall be worth £3 for the future; for here the dealers in those metals would naturally defeat you. Some writers had argued that gold was unfit to be a circulating medium, because it was an article of luxury, but that was the reason which, in his judgment, made it peculiarly fit to be a circulating medium. If any man could contemplate the destruction of a pound, and of an engagement to pay a pound, let that man produce his one solitary sovereign. There were theories which, if they could be consistent with the great principles he had stated, but which were different from others, for instance, that of a double standard in gold and silver; and that of Mr. Ricardo, that paper might be convertible only when the notes tendered for specie should reach to upwards of a certain high amount; but he was forced to adhere to the present system of a single gold standard, and a five-pound note convertible into gold. He would now state the views respecting the principle for the regulation of a paper currency, and took a clear distinction between bills of exchange and those promissory notes which, being payable to bearer, served the double purposes of money. The first Lord Liverpool, a high authority, had endorsed this important distinction between paper credit and a paper currency. In his time, as on ours, the attempt was made to deter the state from improving the paper currency, by the fear of injuring paper credit. Adhere to the standard of value and to the principle of convertibility, for your promissory notes, and there will be nothing to fear from any quantity of bills of exchange. But he did not agree that mere convertibility was of itself a sufficient guarantee against an over issue of promissory notes. He admitted, as to most articles, the safety of leaving them to free competition; but the article of currency was one peculiarly circumstanced; it was not as, object to produce the greatest quantity of this article at the lowest price. He quoted evidence to show that where unlimited powers of issue should be in private hands, there could not be a complete separation between the amount of currency put forth and the state of the money market; in such circumstances a danger would always exist, that as there was beginning to be a rise of prices and a drain of gold, the issue of paper would be increased. Observe the fate of the American issues, and the paper on which had followed that case was a strong illustration that convertibility was not a sufficient guarantee. Now these were his principles, and he thought if fit to lay them down in all their breadth, though he thereby exposed himself to be afterwards told that he did not practise what he preached to the extent. At all events, he would propose no measures inconsistent with his principles; at all events, he would invite no as little individual harm as possible, and avoid injuring those principles by inducing an opinion that they were inconsistent with the safety of private fortunes. It was contended by some that the power of issuing paper, whether in metal or paper, should belong to the state; but this, he agreed with Lord Althorp in thinking, was not an expedient power for any Government to adopt. He would now state the outline of the practical measures which he was prepared to recommend. The Bank of England was the instrument by which he proposed to regulate the future issue of country bank paper. With this view he would divide that establishment into two wholly distinct departments, one for banking and one for issue, with separate accounts and separate officers. The future issue would be entrusted to the Bank of England alone. The other would be restricted to mere banking, by giving power to joint-stock banks to issue and be sued, by removing the present restriction upon the metropolitan joint-stock banks to accept bills at a shorter date than six months, and by some other accommodations. He would require, on the other hand, the frequent publication of the partners' names and of the assets, but not of the general affairs of the private and joint-stock banks. The terms which had been negotiated with the Bank of England for the new arrangements were (in addition to the particulars before specified) the continuance of the already-mentioned loan of £11,000,000, and an annual payment by the Bank to the public of £60,000, in addition to the sum of £120,000 already paid, which they paid for their already existing privileges. The new arrangements would accrue to the Bank of England, for ten years, subject, however, to revision by Parliament, and the private and joint-stock banks would, at the end, be open to a reconsideration of their position by Government at the end of the ten years, when it might be deemed expedient to concentrate all banks of issue into one. For Ireland and Scotland he did not propose to legislate at present, except to the extent of prohibiting new banks of issue, and of requiring that the new banks, not of issue, should be subject to registration, and to certain other checks to be framed by the Government. Sir R. Peel, after going fully through these propositions, summarily recapitulated them, observing that the effect of the control to be vested in the Bank over issues of paper would be to place those issues under the influence of the foreign exchanges. Having thus stated his outline, he hoped that the house and individual members would abstain from pronouncing any opinion then: especially as he intended on the next day to lay before the house the correspondence of the Government with the Bank of England, which must necessarily throw much additional light upon this whole subject. He concluded, by alluding to the satisfaction which he, as the author of the Currency Bill, must receive from the complete fulfilment of his own principles, and to the high power gratification which an public interests he should feel, in placing it in the power of his country to provide a security for the middling and humbler classes against the dangers, the losses, and the anxieties which, in past time, they had endured from the circumstances and failures of the currency.—Several questions respecting small points of the plan were put to Sir R. Peel across the table.—The CHAIRMAN of the committee then read the resolutions, which contained, in separate propositions, the plan of the Government. These resolutions were passed and reported; and the house then went into committee upon the details of the Factories Bill.

Several discussions arose on the 30th clause, limiting the time of children's work to six hours and a half, or in some cases seven hours.—Mr. WARBURTON observed, that though it relieved the individual children whose working time it shortened, yet, by creating a necessity for so many more children to do the work, it increased the total number of children compressed into the large towns, which was the evil chiefly denounced by Lord Ashley. The clause, however passed without a division.—On the 32nd clause, for protecting adult women and young persons, Lord ERSKINGTON, in a few words, objected to the principle of legislating upon contracts of adult labour, and moved the omission of the clause.—Sir JAMES MACKINTOSH objected to it as an interference with free labour.—Mr. HINDLEY thought it an unnecessary clause.—Lord ERSKINGTON said he had walked only to mark his opinion, and would not divide the committee.—Mr. HUME, however, was not disposed to let the matter pass so easily, and insisted upon dividing.—The numbers were—

HOUSE OF LORDS.—TUESDAY.

On the motion of Lord BROUGHAM, the Debtor and Creditor Bill was read a second time.

The Marquis of NORMANBY said that he would postpone his motion respecting the reasons for recalling Lord Ellenborough from the Governor Generalship of India, if the Earl of Ripon was of opinion that the production of all human beings to be indiscreet—in giving his opinion upon the conduct of the Directors of the East India Company. The noble duke could not do otherwise than give that opinion, called for as it was by the course pursued by the Directors—a course which placed him in the difficulty of condemning the conduct of Lord Ellenborough by his silence, or of declaring his dissent from the policy of the Directors. He (Lord Brougham) entirely approved of the appointment of Sir H. Hardinge as the successor of Lord Ellenborough, but was surprised that Lord Ellenborough should have been recalled, when there could be no doubt but his policy would be carried out by his successor—The Duke of WELLINGTON defended the course he had pursued, and said he never entertained an intention or desire to attempt an alteration in the Charter of the East India Company, or in any way to impair or curtail the power of the Court of Directors.—The Marquis of CLANRICARDE regretted that no hope had been held out that the papers would be produced during the present session.—Lord COLCHESTER also regretted that the papers were not to be produced. Lord Ellenborough had been already condemned and punished, and surely it was not too soon now to know the grounds of his recall.—The Earl of WINCHILSEA warmly eulogised the conduct of Lord Ellenborough.—Lord CAMPBELL said that the indiscretion imputed to the Court of Directors by the Duke of Well ington might be appropriately designated a felicitous indiscretion. The matter then dropped.

In reply to a question from the Earl of DERWENTWATER, Lord BROUGHAM said that the whole subject of railway communication was under investigation before a committee of the House of Commons, the reports from which would lead to great and most beneficial alterations, and it was not desirable that a committee should be appointed in that house also.

Some bills on the table were forwarded a stage, and their lordships adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—TUESDAY.

On the motion that the report of the committee on the Leeds and Bradford Railway Bill be taken into further consideration, Mr. MACKINNON moved that the report be further considered that day six months.—A discussion ensued, and the house divided—

The report was then taken into further consideration.

Mr. F. DUNCOMBE moved the adjournment of the debate, in order to give the parties time, until Thursday, to make out a case, and to assent to the public the best line.—Sir G. STRICKLAND seconded the amendment, on the ground that nothing was more dangerous than to exclude evidence. The house divided—

It was then ordered that the bill should be engrossed.

Sir R. PEEL, by command of her Majesty, presented copies of the correspondence with the Bank of England on the subject of the Charter. It was ordered that they should be printed.

The Exchequer Bills Bill was read a third time and passed.

Sir R. PEEL read a letter from Captain Drummond, who, in command of the sloop-of-war Scout, when off Alicante, had been charged with having received the unfortunate insurgent Bonet, by which he fell into the hands of the Spanish troops. From the statement, it appeared that Bonet only came on board the Scout, and, in his capacity of Governor of Alicante, offered the British officer any assistance he might require, but he had never applied in his distress; and the Scout left Alicant the day before it was entered by the Spanish Royalist forces.

Mr. HUME, in moving for the production of the correspondence between the Court of Directors of the East India Company and her Majesty's Government respecting the recall of Lord Ellenborough, explained shortly the nature of the government of India which had thus devolved on them, he had felt it his duty to move all previous differences in cordial conjunction in the choice of a successor. He (Sir Robert Peel) had met Sir Henry Hardinge, the present Chairman and Deputy of the Court of Directors; these gentlemen instantly replied that the same name had occurred to them; and, therefore, Sir Henry Hardinge was induced to accept the appointment, not, as he firmly believed, from any motive of personal ambition, but from the highest and purest sense of what was due to the public interest. No consideration, therefore, would induce him to letter the decision of the new Governor-General, by suffering any small irritation accompanied his departure to carry out a detailed correspondence. All the circumstances attending the recall of his predecessor, and he hoped the house would rest on that foundation. His confidence was so said that the Court had acted under an imperious sense of public duty, and he for one would rather submit to imputation than vindicate their conduct by any thing which might be detrimental to the public interest.—Mr. MACAULEY could see no reason why the Court of Directors had been accused of being guilty of the gravest indiscretion known in our times—an indiscretion greater than the Walcheren expedition, or the Bill of Pains and Penalties against Queen Caroline. A charge involving so much recklessness and rashness, and made on such authority, should be substantiated, otherwise responsibility was a mere name. Sir Robert Peel had avowed for some time, facilities for general trade which past to the future. As one of those who had been concerned in framing the new constitution of the East India Company, he contended that the Court of Directors ought to have the clear acknowledgment that they would not take it to be taken from them without a long and obstinate struggle. He saw the Court of Directors had been unanimous; he found men in a well acquainted with India, ten of them having resided in Calcutta, and intimately acquainted with the character of the ninety or the hundred millions whom they governed, man, with all deference to the Ministerial benches, the whole of the gentlemen who occupied the Treasury benches. Nor were the Directors blind to the party imputations of party feeling; the majority were Conservatives, and supporters of the Government. If they were to suspend their judgment, it should be with no less against the decision of the Directors, and that decision, when the whole correspondence, the conclusion was inevitable that they dare not [illegible] and a few words; and Lor. [illegible] advised Mr. H [illegible] Mr. HUME persisted. No sufficient reason had been [illegible] the correspondence, and if the Court of Directors [illegible] thrown on them, they were crouching dogs, whom [illegible] the power, to-morrow.—Mr. ROEBUCK asked if Sir Robert Peel, by a happy stroke of policy, had made a compromise between the Court of Directors and the Government? Was the objection to Lord Ellenborough's public or to his private conduct? And was Sir Henry Hardinge to act on the policy of his predecessor?—Sir ROBERT PEEL said there had been no compromise. He had stated all that had occurred.—On a division, Mr. Hume's motion was negatived by 197 to 61.

Lord JOHN MANNERS then brought on a motion for a Select Committee to inquire into the operation of the Laws of Mortmain, and the expediency of revising them.—Sir JAMES GRAHAM had opposed a similar motion made by the noble lord last year, but was not prepared to say that no amendment of these laws should take place. He thought, however, that the house, and not a select committee, was the proper place for the deliberation of the subject. He, therefore, moved the previous question, which was carried without a division.—Sir WILLIAM HEATHCOTE obtained leave to bring in a bill to facilitate the collection of county rates, and to relieve high constables from compulsory attendance at quarter sessions.—The other business was then disposed of. On Sir JAMES GRAHAM stating that, in consequence of numerous alterations, the Factories Bill would be re-committed, pro forma, in order to its being reprinted, with a view to the third reading on Friday, some discussion took place; after which the alterations were made preparatory to the reprinting of the bill, and the house adjourned at half-past eight o'clock.

The Houses of Parliament did not sit on Wednesday the Lords in consequence of their usual adjournment; and the Commons in consequence of not making a House.

HOUSE OF LORDS THURSDAY.

The Lord Chancellor having taken his seat on the woolsack at five o'clock, a number of petitions were presented on various subjects, the majority of which referred to the Dissenters' Chapels Bill, the third reading of which was afterwards moved by Lord WHARNCLIFFE.—The Bishop of EXETER strenuously opposed the bill, as calculated to encourage Socinianism and Unitarianism, to the detriment of the doctrine of Christianity, and as an invasion of the rights of trust property with which chapels had been endowed by Trinitarians, for the inculcation of Christian principles.—Lord Monteagle, Earl Fitzwilliam, and several other noble lords, supported the bill, which was opposed by the Earl of Winchelsea. Lord Kenyon, Lord Mountcashel, and Lord Teynham.—After considerable discussion the house divided, when there appeared—

For the third reading	44
Against it	9
Majority	35

The bill was then read a third time, and the other orders of the day having been disposed of, their lordships adjourned at a quarter past seven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS THURSDAY.

The Speaker having taken the chair, the third reading of the Leeds and Bradford Railway Bill was moved by Mr. BARNETT, on which a division took place, and the bill was carried by a majority of 73 to 21.

Lord J. RUSSELL asked when the Government intended to go into committee on the Sugar Duties Bill? —The CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said he would inform the noble lord to-morrow (Friday).—Lord J. RUSSELL then gave notice of his intention to move, on going into committee, that the duty of 34s. per cwt. should be levied on all foreign sugars.

Mr HUME then rose for the purpose of moving that "An humble address be presented to her Majesty, praying that she will be graciously pleased to consider whether it would not be for the advantage of Ireland, and to the interest of the United Kingdom, to abolish the office of Lord Lieutenant of Ireland." The hon. gentleman argued at considerable length against the utility of the office. Mr. BUTLER opposed the motion, which, after a discussion of considerable length, was withdrawn.

Mr. BUTLER moved for a copy of an opinion and advice given by Mr. Pennefather, the present Chief Justice of the Irish Queen's Bench, so far back as the year 1820, in a case of toll, in which the corporation of Kilkenny was interested, and which is supposed to reflect on the personal character of the learned judge. A considerable discussion ensued, and the motion was negatived without a division.

The Savings' Banks Bill was read a second time.

The other orders of the day were then disposed of, and the house adjourned at half-past nine o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS FRIDAY.

Their lordships met at four o'clock.

The royal assent was given by Commission, in the usual form, to the undermentioned bills:—The Exchequer Bills Bill, the National Copyright Bill, the Loan Societies Bill, the Great Western and Cheltenham Railway Bill, the Norwich and Brandon Railway Bill, the South-Western and Guildford Railway Bill, the Midland Counties Railway Bill, the Manchester and Leeds Railway Bill, the Great Northern and Yarmouth Railway Bill, the Manchester and Birmingham Railway Bill, and the Derby Junction Railway Bill.

The Duke of RICHMOND moved for several returns relating to the importation of foreign wool. Considerable discussion ensued, but ultimately the motion was agreed to.

Lord CLONCURRY brought forward a motion for inquiring into the state of Ireland. He in the suggestion of the Marquis of Normanby, the noble lord subsequently withdrew his motion, in order to procure a fuller attendance of peer connected by property with Ireland. These lordships then adjourned at quarter past eight o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS. FRIDAY.

The Speaker took the chair shortly before four o'clock.

The Attorney-General, Sir W. Follett, took the oaths and his seat for Exeter.

Lord FRANCIS EGERTON moved for a new writ for South Lancashire, in the room of Mr. Wilbraham, deceased.

The Dissenters' Chapels Bill was brought down from the Lords, and read a first time.

On the question that the Factories Bill be read a third time, Lord ASHLEY rose. He had opposed the three obnoxious clauses that had been made by the house, he need not make any further attempt, by argument or persuasion, to influence the feeling and understanding of the house. It had, by three distinct clauses, been decided actually to reduce, in some cases, that the period of labour should not amount to twelve hours, and in two cases virtually that the period of labour should not exceed ten hours. On those divisions the world at large expected that a noble house would not be overthrown, but her Majesty's Ministers had refused to consent to that term. They had invited a revival of the debate, by calling on the house to reverse these decisions, and therefore they who stood by the whole of those decisions, and who pointed to the words and meaning of that unfortunate compromise, were not to be charged with wearying the attention of the house, or wasting its valuable time, if they did endeavour to urge every argument and move every resolution to avert the threatening danger—the danger of ministerial influence and official authority. The noble lord then entered into a recapitulation of the arguments in favour of a ten hours bill.

ROYAL ARTILLERY.—Brevet Major Oliver's company, 3rd battalion, proceeded from Ruff's Wharf in the early hour of two o'clock on Tuesday morning, by one of the Woolwich steam-packets to London, and from Euston square, by railway en route to Ireland, to relieve Captain Gosling's company, 8th battalion, preparatory to the return of the latter company to head-quarters, at Woolwich, to hold themselves in readiness to proceed to a foreign station.

NEWFOUNDLAND.

By the Oxford Herald, we perceive that additional provision is about to be made for the spiritual welfare of this much neglected colony, and we sincerely hope that such benevolent undertaking may be successful. It appears that "the Rev. Edward Field, M.A., formerly a fellow of Queen's College, Oxford, having been appointed to succeed Dr A. G. Spencer in the see of Newfoundland, the Pereses and Fellows of that college have resolved, forthwith to commence a subscription towards the formation of a fund for ecclesiastical purposes, to be placed at his disposal, and earnestly request the co-operation of those who feel an interest in the spread and efficiency of the Church in our colonies. The area of Newfoundland is 57,000 square miles. The population—extremely poor, and thinly scattered along the east and south coasts—exceeds 80,000. The number of churches is . . . Two additional clergymen are required to minister to the more remote settlements; their services more eminently blessed. The cost of build ng the Cathedral, which will also be the parish church of St. John's, was estimated at £7,000, exclusive of such of the materials as the means can contribute liberally; but this it will be impossible to complete without further aid.

A recent traveller has well observed, that of all our colonies, Newfoundland, the earliest discovered, is the least known; and a recent writer asserts that it owes its "blotted out of our recollection, or is known only by its dogs;" or, we may add, in association with cod-fish, stock-fish, and train-oil, it is regarded as a mere fishing station. Such, in England, is the general impression; but, under a more judicious system of policy, the colony appears to have grown up into independent wealth and consequence; and agriculture has made such strides there as to induce the inhabitants to send to England for a surveyor to examine the geology of the country, so as to best to direct their future efforts at colonization. The political position of the country both home and foreign, is also constantly interesting the public. By treaty with France, we have no right to settle on the western coast; which consists of high, indented with deep bays, and a great number of wrecks occur annually between La Poile and Cape Ray, the highway, as it were, between Great Britain and the American colonies; numerous lighthouses, however, no lighthouse has been erected, with bells or guns, to give warning in case of fog: every house is surrounded with old rigging, spars, masts, sails, ships' bells, rudders, and wheels of vessels, and numerous other contrivances, canvasses, and portions of ships' furniture. The lands adjacent to the sea are bleak, rugged, and nearly destitute of trees or timber; but at the heads of the bays and near the mouths of rivers, there are some excellent trees for ship purposes, thick hard-wood, and luxuriant raspberry-bushes. Hills and valleys continually succeed each other; heavy marshes and tangled woods are extensive, and only on "the barrens," or gravelly elevated places, can the traveller walk with ease or expedition. The island has not a navigable river, but the lakes, ponds, and other fresh water, cover one-third of the surface. Sir R. Bonnycastle, in 1842, explored, on the eastern and southern sides of the island, vast forests of splendid timber and cultivable regions; and on the western side, prairies, forests, immense lakes, and a great coal basin, upon which there springs up luxuriant grass. There are settlers here, in spite of treaties, who live on the produce of the farms and coal-fields in comparative comfort.

The climate of Newfoundland is very humid and severe, from its exposure to the atmosphere of the Atlantic; and the large fields of ice, which, during

ST. JOHN'S, NEWFOUNDLAND.

March, April, and May, are on the way from the northern shores towards the south and cover the sea adjoining the island to a great distance. Across this stream of icebergs, it is believed that vessels sailing between England and New York will cross; and steam-vessels, in dark weather, owing to their velocity, strike on these hidden perils: in April, 1831, an American ship struck on them, and went down at midnight, with thirty-three souls on board; in the same month and year, the "Great Western" steam-ship just escaped this sea of ice; but the missing "President," is, by persons familiar with the navigation of the Atlantic, supposed to have been lost here.

The principal animals of the island are deer, beavers, dogs, and foxes; seals, cod, salmon, herring, and mackerel. The best cod-fishing grounds are on the Great Bank, 600 miles long, and the fishery is conducted from stages or platforms built along the shore. On the northern shores of Conception Bay are caught that breakfast relish, the delicate capelin, by bucketsfull. What is in England called the Newfoundland dog is comparatively rare in the island; the common dog has a thin tapering snout, a long thin tail, and short and smooth hair; he is less handsome, but more sagacious, and fishes as well as his master.

St. John's port and town are on the east side of the island. The entrance of the harbour is so narrow that two ships can hardly pass abreast with safety: it is sheltered with high rocks, and strongly fortified. The town consists of one main street, and several irregular lanes; the houses are mostly of wood, but some few are of stone or brick and the public buildings are handsome: in 1815, 140 houses, and half a million's worth of property, were destroyed by fire. The population scarcely exceeds 10,000 in summer, but the return of the fishermen in winter increases it to 11,600. Harbour Grace, the next town in importance, has a population of 5,000. The other settlements consist chiefly of a few wooden houses. The fisheries produced, in 1836, £304 066. The inhabitants import salt provisions from Ireland and Germany, biscuit from Germany, flour and Indian corn meal from America, &c.

The government of the island was long administered by surrogate courts (captains and lieutenants of the navy), but the country has now the benefit of a representative system.

The aboriginal Red Indians of the island are believed to be now extinct; but about sixteen years since a few were in existence, and a society was formed for their civilization. A tribe of Micmacs, however, dwell in the southern interior.

ANNIVERSARIES.

ESCAPE OF MARY QUEEN OF SCOTS FROM LOCHLEVEN CASTLE.

Every phase in the life of this ill-fated sovereign is regarded with interest, and her entire career would seem to belong to the romance of history. Neither of its strange events, however, surpasses the escape of the imprisoned Queen from the Castle of Lochleven, an ancient fortress situate on a small island at the north-west end of the lake, in Kinross-shire, Scotland. It was once the property of the Douglasses of Lochleven, but is now a heap of ruins. Thence Mary escaped on the 2nd of May, 1568.

It appears that the marriage of Queen Mary with Bothwell raised the public indignation to such a pitch, that the nobles rose against them, and they fled before an armed and indignant people from fortress to fortress. At length, after they had collected some followers, a pitched battle near Carbery Hill was about to ensue, when Mary abandoned Bothwell, and threw herself on the mercy of her subjects. They conducted her first to Edinburgh, where, as she still persisted in regarding Bothwell as her husband, the nobles resolved that she should be confined during her life in the fortress of Lochleven. She was in a paroxysm of distress when Lords Ruthven and Lindsey arrived at the Palace of Holyrood to inform her that they were commanded to put in execution the order for her commitment. They charged her women to take from her all her ornaments and royal attire; and, being clothed in a mean dress, she was conveyed to the prison appointed for her. The Lords Seton, Yester, and Borthwick endeavoured to rescue her, but failed in the attempt. She was delivered over to William Douglas, the Governor of the Castle of Lochleven, who was nearly related to the Regent Morton. Here, however, Mary continued a prisoner less than twelve months, when she effected her escape by the aid of the governor's brother, George Douglas, who had become enamoured of her. On May 2, in the year above named, when her keeper was at supper with his family, George Douglas having possessed himself of the keys of the Castle, hastened to the Queen's apartment, and conducted her out of prison. Having locked the Castle gates, they entered a boat which awaited them, and being rowed across the lake, the Lord Seton received the Queen with a chosen band of horsemen in complete armour. That night he conveyed her to his house of Niddrie, in West Lothian; having rested there a few hours, she set out for Hamilton, and was soon at the head of a gallant army. The battle of Langside ensued, where she was completely routed; upon which she fled towards Galloway, and thence passed into England, hoping to secure the favour of Elizabeth. In this, however, she was mistaken; for Elizabeth contrived to detain her a captive in her dominions till Feb. 8, 1587, a period of about 19 years, when Mary was beheaded for alleged conspiracy, in Fotheringhay Castle, in the 45th year of her age.

ESCAPE OF MARY QUEEN OF SCOTS FROM LOCHLEVEN CASTLE.

BATTERSEA-BRIDGE.

This aboriginal specimen of bridge-building has just been brought into notice from its having been the scene of a terrific murder, or rather of the infliction of a wound which led to almost immediate death. It has already been given in evidence by a gentleman resident at Chelsea, that on the night of Monday, the 29th ult., about half past ten o'clock, he passed through the toll-gate of Battersea-bridge on the Surrey side, and crossed the road to the left or upper side of the bridge, when he stood still, and looked over the top of the bridge, to see how the tide was running, it being clear moonlight. Saw no one at that moment on the bridge, but presently afterwards he saw a woman running towards him from about the top or crown of the bridge. When he first observed her, he heard her cry out, "Oh dear!" and, on seeing him she came up to him, and, laying hold of him said, "Oh dear, will you be good enough, sir, to take me to the toll-house?" Thinking that she had been drinking, he asked her what she wanted to go to the toll-house for; when she instantly replied, "Somebody has cut me." She was then reeling, and as she looked round she saw the toll-collector, and ran off to him. He then observed that his hand had blood on it, and he immediately followed to the toll-house, and said to the toll-collector, "What is the matter with this woman?" when the toll-collector replied, "She says some one has cut her." The woman then fainted. It was dark at the time, but still light enough for him to see blood flowing from under her arm. He then examined her throat, and on doing so, exclaimed, "Good God! her throat is cut." She was then removed to the Swan, where she shortly afterwards expired. As might be expected, the bridge has since been visited by thousands of curious persons.

We may take this opportunity of stating, that Battersea-bridge was erected in the year 1771, at a cost of £20,000: it is private property, and a toll is accordingly levied upon all passengers, &c. It has been the scene of many accidents to steam-boats and small craft; for it would be difficult to design a structure more inconvenient to the navigation of the river than is this bridge—aboriginal we have termed it from its rude construction. It is a point of considerable interest to Thames anglers.

Formerly, Blackfriars and Westminster-bridges were favourite places of resort, but various causes have driven the fish up the river; and the first station is now Battersea-bridge, where good roach and dace fishing may be had, during the months of July, August, September, and October, from a boat fastened to the piles of the bridge.

CHURCHES OF THE METROPOLIS.—No. XLII.

NEW CHURCH, CHELSEA.

This neat edifice has been erected on a piece of ground adjoining the Royal Military Asylum premises; the south side of the structure facing Turk-row; the east and west ends are at present partially obscured—on the east by the asylum wall, and on the west by some dwelling-houses, which in all probability will ere long be removed, so as to afford a much better view of the building than can at present be obtained.

The church is in the early English style, and consists of a nave and two side aisles; the clere-story walls being supported by arches springing from octagonal piers; a spacious gallery is continued round three sides of the church, and, with the seats on the ground-floor, will accommodate 850 persons; more than half of that number being free seats. The interior throughout is lofty and well proportioned.

NEW CHURCH, CHELSEA.

The tower is placed at the south-west angle, with an entrance in two sides; the lower part containing the staircase to galleries, and the upper part being occupied by the belfry; a small porch at the south-west corner forms another entrance into the church.

The church is from the design of Mr. Basevi, one of the architects of the New Conservative Club, now erecting in St. James's-street. The church has been well built of stock-bricks, with Caen stone dressings, by Mr. Freake, of Chelsea.

The expense of erection will be about £3000; to be defrayed by grants from the Church Building Commissioners, and the Incorporated Society for Building and Enlarging Churches, and by subscriptions; the Rev. Richard Burgess, Rector of Upper Chelsea, has taken a prominent part in the proceedings from the commencement. The foundation, or, more properly speaking, the first stone, was laid by the Governor of Chelsea Hospital in the early part of the spring of last year, and the edifice is now very near completion.

THE DRAWING-ROOM POLKA.

We are much gratified in being enabled to lay before our readers an accurate description of the véritable, or Drawing-room Polka, as danced at Almack's, and at the balls of the nobility and gentry in this country.

La Polka having appeared amongst us under so many different guises, we determined to spare no pains to procure a true description of its danse; for which we are indebted to Mrs. James Rae, who has been fortunate enough to secure the details from M. Coralli, Pils, the instructor of the young noblesse and gentry in Paris.

La Polka, like its predecessors, the waltz and galop, is a danse à deux, couples following each other in the salle de danse, commencing at pleasure, and adopting, of the following figures, that which pleases them most at the moment. All those anxious to shine in La Polka will dance the whole of them, returning from time to time, by way of rest, to the first figure.

The measure, or time, is 2-4; but to facilitate our definition we subdivide each measure or bar into one—two—three—four; the accent on the two, to be played not so fast as the galop.

The steps are two, and the following description may, in some measure, convey them to our readers; we commence with the first and most general. At the one, hop on the right leg, lifting or doubling up your left leg at the same moment; at the two, put your left leg boldly forward on the ground; at the three, bring your right toe up to your left heel; at the four, advance your left foot a short step forward: now at the one in the next measure or bar of the tune, hop on the left leg, doubling or lifting up your right leg, and so on proceeding in this step with your arm circling your partner's waist round the room, as shown in our sketch. This may be termed the first figure.

As the change of figures and duration of each in this dance is left entirely to the cavaliers, as also the most careful guidance of their ladies round the room, we must be supposed to be address ng ourselves to them in three remarks, though, at the same time, our definitions will be equally understood by their fair partners.

sketch); you then reverse this figure, and let your partner do the back step whilst you pursue her, and at the same time carefully guide her round the room.

In backing, the leg which in figure 1 you put boldly forward on the ground, you now fling boldly backward, and are thus enabled to effect your progress round the room.

Figure 3.—With the same step you waltz round the room—in other words, you perform the galop waltz, substituting the Polka step just described.

Figure 4.—This also is a waltz with the second step, which we will now describe as the "Heel and Toe step." At the one, make a little hop on the right leg, dropping your left heel close to the right foot; at the two, another little hop on the right leg, pointing your left toe (not forward, but as close to the right foot as possible); at the three, another little hop on the right leg, advancing one step forward with the left foot; at the four, bring up the right foot, turning at the same instant, and passing your partner over to your left arm from your right arm; in the next measure return your lady to the left arm, and so on.

Figure 5.—This is termed the back waltz. The step adopted in it by yourself and partner is the back step described in figure 2; and you turn in this waltz exactly the contrary way to that in which you turn in all other waltzes—hence its name.

In La Polka, before commencing the figures we have just described, there is a short introduction (of which we give a sketch), consisting of four measures, danced thus:—leading your partner from her seat, and giving her her place in the circle, and placing yourselves vis-à-vis, you take her left hand in your right, and make the first step four times—first forward, then backward, forward again, and then backward, taking care to gain ground in the forward steps; you then start with the first figure.

In conclusion we would observe that La Polka is a noiseless dance; there is no stamping of heels or toes, or kicking of legs in sharp angles forward. This may do very well at the threshold of a Bohemian auberge, but is inadmissible into the salons of London or Paris. La Polka, as danced in Paris, and now adopted by us, is elegant, graceful, and fascinating in the extreme; it is replete with opportunities of showing care and attention to your partner in assisting her through its performance. To our fair readers, however, we would say one word. for careful as their cavaliers may be, the front of many dresses, particularly in executing figure 2, will have much chance of being trodden upon and torn, unless the usual length is considerably shortened. This we have seen done with much grace on one or two occasions by the transplanting of a bunch of artificial violets, with a long pin attached thereto, from the waist to the lower part of the dress, which serves to loop it up to the desired shortness, and which contributes greatly to the elegance of this dance, as the feet are thus shown, which is indispensable.

WRECK OF "THE SEVERN" STEAMER, NEWPORT-BRIDGE.

WRECK OF THE "SEVERN" SCREW-STEAMER.

Within these few weeks two new iron steamers, the Severn and Avon, fitted with the Archimedean screw and high-pressure engines, have been started in opposition to the old line of steam-packets between Bristol and Newport, South Wales. On Saturday evening last, about a quarter to six o'clock, when about to start, the Severn was lying at her berth, near the Newport bridge, with her bow towards the bridge, her stern being down the river, or in the direction of Bristol. At this time the tide was running up the Newport river very strongly, at about seven knots an hour; and of course near to the bridge the current produced by the tide shooting through the arches of the bridge was much stronger. The signal for starting having been given, the captain commenced swinging the vessel round, and cast off the stern-chain, depending upon the bow-rope and the power of the engine, for bringing her round with her head to the tide, and thus getting her under weigh. At this moment, when the order was given to back her, it was found that the screw would not revolve; the vessel immediately swung round, and, carried with the run of the tide, struck with her bow the wedgelike buttress of the bridge, and, recoiling, almost instantly struck with her side against another buttress with such force that every one on the bridge fully expected to see her turn clean over. At this moment the scene was truly distressing—the spectators on shore, as well as their friends on board, screaming dreadfully. Boats were instantly put in requisition, and the passengers, upwards of fifty in number, were fortunately all got on shore; but not without great difficulty. The pumps were then rigged, and exertions made to save the steamer, other persons being employed in the meantime in removing the luggage, &c., which was safely effected. In about an hour and a half, however, she was seen to go down, the captain and crew having only just jumped into some boats, previously to her sinking; indeed, they stayed by her so long that their boats were swamped; but the crew were fortunately picked up and rescued, though not until some of them had been drawn under the bridge, and to some distance above it.

The cause of the catastrophe is thus explained in the Times report, the information having been received from a gentleman connected with her engineering department, and who was on board at the time of the accident. He says that on the arrival of the Severn at Newport, on Saturday, it was intended to put a new screw into her; when the captain stated it to be so late upon tide, that if it were done, he should not have time to swing her round in the slack tide. The intention was then abandoned, and shortly after, while the cargo was being landed, the vessel grounded, upon which the captain, finding that she could not be swung until the next tide, the screw she was then working with was removed, and a new one put in; and it is gentleman says that almost immediately up to the time of the water covering the screw all was free and everything right, for he himself turned round the screw by hand. The steam was then got up, and no danger was apprehended. Upon the orders being given on Saturday evening, the screw was put in motion, but before it had made a single revolution it stopped, and the vessel drifted up the river. She then struck forward, but only bent the iron; the after-strain was, however, so great, that it shortly became a rent, and her fore compartment instantly filled with water (the vessel being built in watertight compartments). Every exertion was made, until the water rushing over her decks, she filled and sank, rolling heavily over. Still no cause could be assigned for the non-action of the screw; but, on the tide leaving her, a chain was discovered firmly twisted round the screw, which had thus caused her destruction. How the chain came there is a complete mystery, as all her mooring chains have since been examined, and are safe, and the captain and crew say that they had no such chain on deck. The vessel subsequently rolled over with every tide, and had a rent in her side from the deck to her keel, large enough for men to walk in and out.

The accompanying sketch is taken from the Old Company's wharf, and includes the Bridge Inn, the Bridge, and Castle—the latter now used as a brewery; the large building in course of erection upon the hill is the new Barracks.

At low water, as the wreck lay dry, the owners were enabled to examine her damages. It was then discovered that she had a transverse fissure in her larboard bends, the iron plates of which were rent asunder, from two to three feet wide, and from six to seven feet long, caused by her coming in contact with the pier, and the constant friction produced by the action of the tide upon the vessel. During the whole of Saturday night, men were engaged in repairing the breach and lightening the vessel, but the tide returning on Sunday morning, carried the vessel back against the bridge, sweeping away a large portion of her bulwarks; for a few moments she righted, but such was the force of the tide, that she fell over on her larboard side, and her masts, coming in contact with the bridge, they snapped asunder, and, with her standing rigging, were carried away with the tide. During the whole of Sunday, the workmen were engaged in covering the breach with boards, and caulking every joint, stopping all the ports, scuppers, hatchways, and making every effort to get out and keep out the water on the return of the tide; a number of empty barrels were put into the hold, with a view to buoy her up; strong warps and chains were attached, and a steam-tug procured, so that on the flood-tide they might be enabled to bring her head to the stream; but, notwithstanding every exertion made, the assistance of the tug-boat and fifteen stout brewery horses, such was the force of the tide, that it was found impossible to move her. On the ebb of the tide, the vessel was carried down the river forty or fifty yards, upon a hard gravelly bottom, considerably abrading her keel and bottom plates; and on the flow she was carried back to her old position against the bridge, where she now remains, on her beam-ends, a complete wreck. The vessel, it is believed, belongs to Messrs. Stothen, Slaughter, and Co., of Bristol, and was considered to be one of the finest boats leaving that port.

BURNING OF THE MANCHESTER THEATRE ROYAL.

DESTRUCTION OF THE MANCHESTER THEATRE ROYAL BY FIRE.

We regret to state that on Tuesday morning last, the extensive Theatre Royal at Manchester was totally destroyed by fire. It appears that the theatre was used on the previous evening, and was closed about the usual time. Just after the police left their beats, at a little before six, some persons going to their work observed flames issuing from the windows, and immediately gave information to Mr. Rose, at the police-yard. That active officer immediately hurried to the spot with the Niagara engine, and was speedily followed by his son, Mr. Thos as Rose, with eight other engines, being the entire effective force of the Fire Brigade. Upon their arrival they found the building one large mass of flame; they made strenuous attempts to save the place, and succeeded in preserving the dressing-rooms and part of the wardrobe. The scenery speedily fell a sacrifice to the flames. Mr Rose, find ng it impossible to save the stage part of the building, next attempted to save the auditory, in doing which a large portion of the roof gave way, and fell upon Mr. Rose and four or five of the men, one of whom was carried to the infirmary, where he now lies in a dangerous state. At half past seven, the building was entirely gutted, and nothing but the walls were left, as there are represented in our engraving sketched during the conflagration A party of military were sent from the barracks, and kept off the crowd. The building of the theatre was insured for £4000 in the Imperial, and we understand that Mr. Roxby, the manager, is insured to the extent of £600 or £700; but these amounts are far below the real loss. The origin of the fire is unknown.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY MAY 11, 1844.

On Monday evening Sir R. Peel brought forward his plan for the revision of the Bank Charter. His speech occupied three hours, and though on an abstruse subject, and one which, we firmly believe, is less understood than any other question of the day, he commanded the attention of a house very fully attended to the close of his address. This was, doubtless, to a great extent, due to his position; he spoke as one having authority, possessing the power to bind and loose even the corporation of money-monarchs who sit throned in Tarcadneedle-street. His speech was not a mere arguing on this side of the question or on that; it was but the preface to Acts which are to operate on all the affairs of life so far as they are affected by the currency, and, as he truly stated in the commencement of his address, very few are the affairs of life into which money does not enter in some shape or other, directly or indirectly. To his position, then, may be attributed, as well as to his ability, the attention with which he was heard; and to keep up that attention through the immense mass of matter he went into, required no slight effort. We cannot attempt to go into the question here: it is one of those subjects on which the differences of opinion are greater and more various than on any other. We have every shade of it, between Sir R. Peel's attachment to the stability of cash payments and the power of converting paper into gold at will, without which power the paper would be valueless, and the "Emancipation of Industry" men, who pronounce the fixed price of gold to be a fixed injustice, and who contend that it should be left to find its natural price in the market in proportion to the value of other articles—for a free trade in money, in fact; and, lastly, the extreme paper-currency men, of the Birmingham and Attwood school, who deny the right of any Government to interfere in the commercial dealings of man with man, or prescribe limits to the extent to which one man may give or take credit from another. Both these sections are of course opposed to the present system, and still more to the prospect of an extension of it which is held out by the resolutions of Sir R. Peel, which evidently point to the future establishment of only one bank of issue.

The prospect of this result has thrown the currency enthusiasts into dismay, and they predict nothing less than universal ruin and anarchy as the destiny of the nation. But in the meantime the nation seems in no wise alarmed about the matter, but goes on producing, buying, and selling, and, through its representatives, supporting the Prime-Minister in giving solidity to the "representative of value."

We must refer the reader to our report of the Premier's speech for the arguments by which he supports his plan, merely appending here, in a separate form, the "resolutions," which will remain under the consideration of Parliament, and then be embodied in a measure, which the Bank of England has, by anticipation, accepted.

1. That it is expedient to continue to the Bank of England, for a time to be limited, certain of the privileges now by law vested in that corporation, subject to such conditions as may be provided by any act to be passed for that purpose

2. That it is expedient to provide by law that the Bank of England should henceforth be divided into two separate departments—one exclusively confined to the issue and circulation of notes, the other to the conduct of banking business.

3. That it is expedient to limit the amount of securities upon which it shall henceforth be lawful for the Bank of England to issue promissory notes payable to bearer on demand, and that such amount shall only be increased under certain conditions to be prescribed by law.

4. That it is expedient to provide by law that a weekly publication should be made by the Bank of England of the state both of the circulation and of the banking departments.

5. That it is expedient to repeal the law which subjects the notes of the Bank of England to the payment of composition for stamp duty.

6. That in consideration of the privileges to be continued to the Bank of England, the rate of fixed annual payment to be made by the Bank to the public shall be £180,000 per annum, and shall be defrayed by deducting the said sum from the sum now by law payable to the Bank, for the management of the public debt.

7. That in the event of any increase of the securities upon which it shall be lawful for the Bank of England to issue such promissory notes, as aforesaid, a further annual payment shall be made by the Bank of England to the public, over and above the said fixed payment of £180,000, equal in amount to the net profit derived from such increase of securities, after deducting all charges and incidental expenses.

8. That it is expedient to prohibit by law the issue of promissory notes payable to bearer on demand, by any bank not now issuing such notes, or by any bank hereafter to be established in any part of the United Kingdom.

9. That it is expedient to provide by law that such banks in England and Wales as now issue promissory notes payable to bearer on demand shall be allowed to issue such notes, subject to such conditions and to such limitations as to the amount of issue as may be provided for by any act to be passed for that purpose.

10. That it is expedient to provide by law for the weekly publication of the amount of promissory notes payable to bearer on demand circulated by any bank authorized to issue such notes.

11. That it is expedient to make further provision by law with regard to joint-stock banking companies

The recall of Lord Ellenborough has furnished the subject for one evening's discussion in both Houses of Parliament. In both of them the Ministry was asked to produce the correspondence that has passed on the subject, and in both it refused the request. The refusal is defended, on the ground that it would cause inconvenience and embarrassment in the administration of the affairs of India, and would do injustice to Lord Ellenborough. The objections are equally strong to producing any part of the papers, as the whole; for a time, therefore, the public must still continue in ignorance of the specific reasons for the step taken by the Court of Directors. In the House of Commons, Sir R. Peel, though he equally refused to produce the papers, gave a kind of statement of the differences that had taken place between the two bodies, the Directors and the Government, with which the public is already acquainted, and an account of the negotiations that have taken place as to the appointment of Lord Ellenborough's successor. Sir R. Peel was at first inclined to give the Directors the right of choosing the new Governor-General, as they had thought proper to recall the old one. But, on second thoughts, it was considered better that the Board and the Government should, if possible, act in concert in this step, if they could not in the other, and it was thus brought about by the Premier:—

I said to the Chairman of the Court of Directors that, on the part of Government, I am willing to enter into communication with them for the purpose of deciding upon the appointment; but then I will not venture to suggest any one unless I feel assured that he will receive the confidence of the Court of Directors and that the line of policy he will pursue will be approved of (cheers). And it was the desire of the Court to act in harmony with the Government on this question, I named to the Deputy Chairman my right honourable friend Sir Henry Hardinge (cheers), and I said that when I reflected on that right honourable gentleman's public conduct, with my long experience of his character, added to the military eminence he has attained, and the great experience he has had in civil affairs, I said that on the whole I was of opinion he was the man best qualified to undertake the arduous office of Governor-General of India (cheers). I was informed at once that the same name had occurred to the Chairman, and I was assured that no person could be selected who would be so acceptable as my right honourable friend. With respect then to the successor of Lord Ellenborough, the Crown and the Court of Directors have settled the question in perfect concord.

Thus, if any inconvenience has been caused by the quarrel, nothing, apparently, can be more satisfactory than the reconciliation. The concurrence of the Board of Directors in the appointment of Sir H. Hardinge seems an indication that the offence of Lord Ellenborough is of a personal character, rather than a matter of policy, for the late Secretary at War will, no doubt, pursue the course marked out by the Cabinet at home; but then he, as a man of common sense and experience—who, being a real soldier, will indulge in no military affectations—will pursue it in a less objectionable manner. As if to justify the Board of Directors in the determination they came to to recall the ex-Governor-General, one of the last Indian papers contains a report of a speech delivered by him at an entertainment given as a compliment to him at Calcutta, which, though short, is "in the Her'cles vein," and conveys censure, threat, and insult to those he governs, in the course of a few brief sentences. What can be the meaning of such phrases as this?—"Most people come here to make their fortunes, but I came here to do my duty;" again, "I have met with opposition, but I have put down all opposition hitherto—and I will beat down all opposition that may arise." The following is rather mysterious, but it shows plainly enough that there is something wrong at Calcutta:—"I have come among you again; and if those social relations which are desirable, do not exist, the fault will be yours and not mine."

THE COURT AND HAUT TON.

The Queen, accompanied by the Princess Royal, and attended by the Marchioness of Douro, Lady in Waiting, left Buckingham Palace, at a quarter before six o'clock on Saturday afternoon, in a carriage and four, escorted by a party of the Royal Horse Guards, for Claremont. His Royal Highness Prince Albert attended as usual, went from Buckingham Palace shortly before six o'clock on Saturday afternoon, to attend the annual dinner of the Royal Academy in Trafalgar-square. After the dinner his Royal Highness departed for Claremont.

CLAREMONT, SUNDAY.—Her Majesty and Prince Albert, attended the ladies and gentlemen of the Royal Suite and Household, attended Divine Service on Sunday morning at Claremont. The Rev. Hugh Wilson, Minister of Esher.

MONDAY.—On Monday morning at ten o'clock, his Royal Highness Prince Albert left Claremont on horseback for Hounslow, and Colonel Wylde, equerry in waiting, and rode to Richmond. His Royal Highness left Richmond, in a travelling carriage and four for town, and proceeded to the Hanover-square Rooms, where he remained during the rehearsal of the concert of Ancient music, which had been ordered by his Royal Highness, the Prince of the Concert on Wednesday evening. Prince Albert, accompanied by Colonel Wylde, went from the Hanover-square Rooms to Buckingham Palace, where his Royal Highness arrived at ten minutes past two o'clock. The Prince, after luncheon at the Palace, took his departure in a carriage and four, and rode to Claremont at half past four o'clock, attended by Colonel Wylde.

TUESDAY.—On Tuesday morning the Queen and Prince Albert walked in Claremont Park. The royal family were then entertained during the morning in the gardens of Claremont.

WEDNESDAY.—The Queen and Prince Albert, accompanied by the Princess Royal, arrived in town a little after three o'clock on Wednesday afternoon, in a carriage and four, escorted by a party of the Royal Horse Guards, from Claremont. Their Royal Highnesses the Prince of Wales and the Princess Alice followed in another carriage and four. A grand dinner was given to the visitors at Buckingham Palace, to the noble directors of the Concert of Ancient Music, his Royal Highness Prince Albert being the director for the evening. At eight o'clock his Royal Highness Prince Albert, accompanied by his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, and the Duke of Wellington, left Buckingham Palace for the Hanover-square Rooms. At a quarter past eight o'clock the Queen left the Palace, to honour the performance of the concert with her presence at the Hanover-square Rooms. Her Majesty was accompanied by her Royal Highness the Duchess of Cambridge and was attended by the Duchess of Buccleuch.

THURSDAY.—The Queen and Prince Albert went to Marlborough House, to visit her Majesty the Queen Dowager. Her Majesty and his Royal Highness, attended by the Equerries in Waiting, Colonel Buckley and Colonel Wylde, arrived at Marlborough House at a quarter before five o'clock. The illustrious visitors remained with the Queen Dowager about an hour, and afterwards returned to Buckingham Palace. Their Royal Highnesses the Prince of Wales, the Princess Royal, and the Princess Alice, were present at their usual daily sittings, in the royal gardens of Buckingham Palace.

THE QUEEN DOWAGER.—Her Majesty, we are gratified to state, is very much better. On Monday her Majesty left Marlborough House in an open barouche and four, attended by the Hon. Charlotte Hudson, maid of honour in waiting, and took an airing, for the first time since her recent indisposition. After a long drive her Majesty returned to Marlborough House.

THE DUCHESS OF GLOUCESTER.—Her Royal Highness continues slowly but gradually to recover from the effects of her recent accident.

THE EMPEROR OF RUSSIA.—It is stated that Lieut.-General Lord Bloomfield, G.C.B., &c., Commandant of Woolwich garrison, has received her Majesty's commands to proceed forthwith to St. Petersburgh, for the purpose of escorting his Imperial Majesty to England. It is generally believed that Lord Bloomfield has been selected for the honourable duty in consequence of his Lordship being personally known to the Emperor during his long residence at the Court of Sweden. In the absence of Lord Bloomfield, the command of the garrison will devolve on Major-General Sir Hew Ross, K.C.B., Deputy Adjutant General of the Royal Artillery.

The Countess of Jersey gave a splendid ball on Monday night at the family mansion in Berkeley-square. At least 560 of the élite of fashionable society were present at the fête.

The Marquess of Hertford, we hear, is seriously and opposition day at her chateau at Bagatelle, near Paris. Her ladyship has been for many years an absentee. The Marquis of Hertford is on the Continent.

Sir J. Lenthion, Bart., died at his residence on Tuesday week. The deceased baronet, who was in holy orders, succeeded to the baronetcy in 1837.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

THE POST-OFFICE.—The ordinary Post-office returns, which have just been made to Parliament, show, among others, the following results:—The number of letters delivered in the United Kingdom, in 1843, was upwards of 220 millions. The gross revenue which are produced in 1844, show an increase over the corresponding week of 1843 of a quarter of a million of letters per week—this is an increase in the rate of increase, owing, no doubt, to an improvement in trade. The letters of the London districts are now at the rate of 36 millions per annum, or fully double the number under the old system, notwithstanding that, up to the date of the returns, there had been no increase in the number of town deliveries. The gross revenue of the year 1843 was £1,656,957, and the net revenue £640 217; showing in each instance an increase, as compared with 1842, of about £40 000; which, considering the important reductions in foreign rates, has much exceeded the expected. The gross revenue is now about 70 per cent of that received under the old system, and it exceeds that obtained during the prosperous year. The money orders still increase in number and amount. The sum annually remitted through the Post office in England and Wales alone is now nearly five millions. The increase of money orders, since 1839 is 25 fold.

LITERARY FUND SOCIETY. The fifth anniversary dinner of the Literary Fund Society took place on Wednesday, at the Freemasons' Hall, Great Queen-street. There were about two hundred gentlemen present, and the chair was taken by the Marquis of Northampton, supported by Lord Robert Grosvenor, M.P., Lord Ellesmere, Lord J. Manners, M.P., Sir R. H. Inglis, M.P., the Earl of Arundel and Surrey, General Pasley, Sergeant Pallourd, M.P., Mr. Gally Knight, M.P., Professor Owen, Mr. Monckton Milnes, M.P., Sir John Barrow, Dr. Pusey, President of the College of Physicians, Professor Towne, Mr. Harcourt, M.P., Mr. M'Lean, M.P., the High Sheriff of Wilts Colonel Sabine, Dr. Roget, Viscount Emlyn, Count Revenstlow, the Danish Ambassador; the Venerable Archdeacon Burney, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, &c. The principle of the society, as explained by the committee in their address, is to administer assistance to authors of genius and learning, who may be reduced to distress by unavoidable circumstances, or deprived by misfortune of the timely use of the powers of their assistance. During the subscription a received during the evening, including 100 guineas from her Majesty, amounted to upwards of £280.

GOVERNESSES' BENEVOLENT INSTITUTION.—On Thursday the first annual meeting of the supporters of this institution was held at the Hanover-square Rooms, the Hon. Wm. Ashley in the chair, to receive the report for the past year, and elect, from a list of 70 candidates, an annuitant of £15. The Rev. D. Laing Hon. Secretary, read the report, which gave a gratifying account of the success of the institution. It was under the patronage of the Queen Dowager, and several other noble patronesses, and had now been in existence nearly two years. Since June, 1843, the committee examined 178 applications, assisting 55 cases, and invested £360 to purchase an annuity of £15 for aged governesses. The sum of £2351 9s. 9d., was received from governesses towards the purchase of annuities for themselves. The receipts were £2 15s 6d, and the expenditure, including invested capital, &c., and £96 given to governesses in temporary distress, left a balance of £695 3s. 11d. in the bankers' hands. Upon the motion of Earl Mayores the report was adopted. Thanks having been voted the ladies and gentlemen who interested themselves in forwarding the institution, and to its several officers, a poll was opened for the election of an annuitant, to be declared during the SCOTCH PARTY SESSIONS.—George Puckett, the son of a labouring man, was charged before the Rev. Thomas Carter, Mayor Hunt, and Thomas Coates, Esq., by Joseph Collard, the chief inspector of police of the Great Western Railway Company, with having wantonly placed a quantity of stone on the rails, near Slough, to the imminent danger of the lives of the passengers, &c. The case was proved, and the magistrates inflicted a fine of £5 and costs, and in default of payment the offender was sent to Aylesbury Gaol, for one month.

FESTIVAL OF THE SONS OF THE CLERGY. On Tuesday, the annual festival in commemoration of the establishment of this charity took place at St. Paul's Cathedral. His Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury, Lodge, and subsequently the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishops of London, Worcester, Chester, Durham, Landaff, Lincoln, Lichfield, and Peterborough were present. The sermon was preached by the Rev. Henry Melville, B.D., Principal of Hertford College. Mr. Melville's eloquent and spirit-stirring appeal was responded to by a liberal collection. During the last year an additional number of orphan children have been admitted into the schools in connexion with the charity, which is at present in a prosperous state. Schools for the sons of clergymen have been established at Marlborough, Wilts, with the sanction and under the patronage of the Bishop of Salisbury, and other prelates of the church.

ST. PAUL'S SCHOOL.—Wednesday was apposition day at St. Paul's School, when the speeches and prizes were delivered with all the pomp and circumstance which generally attend these interesting solemnities. Long before two o'clock the spacious school-room was thronged by an eager and anxious audience, the greater portion consisting of the friends and families of the boys who are being now educated at the school. The Archbishop of Canterbury arrived shortly after two o'clock, at the residence of the High Master, and was immediately conducted into the school-room by the Rev. Mr. Kynaston, accompanied by the Bishop of Durham, the Bishop of Lichfield, the Dean of Peterborough, and several other high dignitaries and distinguished ornaments of the church. The reserved seats were exclusively occupied by ladies, who appeared to take the greatest interest in the proceedings. Young Vincent, the most successful competitor for the prizes, opened the proceedings by delivering a Latin oration composed by himself in honour of the founder of the school. The successful competitors for the prizes, Vincent, Brien, Carver, and Clay, then came forward, and were addressed by Mr. Kynaston, the High Master, who complimented them on the result of their labours. The prizes, which were distributed by the High Master, consisted of splendid editions of Strabo, Plato, Clarendon's "History of the Rebellion," and other standard works, all of them handsomely bound in a style of sumptuous magnificence. Vincent could hardly stagger beneath the weight of his honourable gains, and as he carried off his load of honours, he was greeted with shouts of sympathising applause from his schoolfellows, in which the audience appeared to participate con amore. After the speeches had been delivered the Archbishop of Canterbury briefly addressed the boys who had obtained the honourable rewards of merit, and told them that he had regularly attended on those occasions for the last thirty years, but that he never remembered to have listened to compositions which evinced so intimate a knowledge of the writings of antiquity, as those which he had just heard read. His grace then requested that an extra holiday might be given to the boys, which was forthwith acceded to by the High Master, and the venerable prelate then left the school room, accompanied by the Bishops of Durham and Lichfield, and the remainder of the company retired shortly after.

PAINTERS PENSION SOCIETY. The anniversary dinner of this society took place on Tuesday evening, at the London Tavern, Bishopsgate-street. Precisely at six o'clock, the Right Honourable Lord Robert Grosvenor took the chair, and was supported by Mr. Sheriff Musgrove, Mr. Sheriff Moon, Henry Colburn, Esq., and a large assemblage of gentlemen connected in various ways with the press. Upwards of 160 gentlemen sat down to an excellent dinner. The subscriptions for the evening amounted to nearly £300.

LINCOLN'S INN.—A second call to the bar took place on Tuesday evening in the hall of this honourable society, of the gentlemen undermentioned, to whom the usual oaths were administered before several of the benchers present:—Mr. John Thomas Revell, of Hatfield, county of Limerick; Mr. Thomas Sewell, of Holborn, in the county of Middlesex; Mr. Birdsey Harvey, of Doddinghurst, in the county of Essex; Mr. Frederick Currey, of Trinity College, Cambridge; Mr. William Yates, of Emmanuel College, Cambridge; Mr. Thomas Deree Salmon, of Exeter College Oxford; Mr. William Villiers Fowke, of Calus College, Cambridge; and Mr. Robert William Keate, of Christ Church, Oxford.

THE ART-UNION OF LONDON. On Tuesday last a deputation from the general body of artists, composed of the following gentlemen, Messrs. Henry Warren, G. R. Ward, R. Rothwell, W. Finden, E. Goodall, C. Moore, A. Clint, F. T. Harraden, J. B. Pyne, J. Stephanoff, A. Aglio, and R. W. Buss, were honoured with an interview by Sir R. Peel, upon the subject of Art-Unions. The deputation was accompanied by Thomas Wyse, Esq., M.P. The great advantages that the arts had derived were fully developed in results obtained from the Londons, Dublin, Manchester, Birmingham, and other Art-Unions, and the deputation enumerated the various sums expended on works in the following exhibitions by the London Art-Union:—

	1843	With additional sums expended by prizeholders.
Royal Academy	£3969 5 0	£3305 15 0
Society of British Artists	2350 0 0	2880 7 0
Society of Painters in Water Colours	679 17 0	——
New Society of Painters in Water Colours	676 3 0	625 0 0
British Institution	1095 7 0	1208 0 0

Sir Robert Peel suggested, as the most advisable course, that a committee be appointed to consider this particular subject, and that any member of the house moving to that effect, her Majesty's Government would not oppose it: advising a special committee rather than a reference to the committee now sitting upon the subject of bets on horse-racing, from which it must be considered, in its nature and ultimate objects, perfectly cast net. Sir R. Peel, addressing Mr. Wyse, expressed his conviction that his suggestion could not be placed in better hands than in a member of Parliament, whom he was addressing; and who expressed his willingness to at once bring the matter before the house, and in whose hands the petition from the general body of artists will be placed on Monday next, having already received the signatures of five hundred artists.

ST. STEPHEN'S, WALBROOK.—On Tuesday Alderman Gibbs and Mr. Whitaker, as the representatives of the select vestry, and Messrs. Rock and Flight, as the representatives of the general vestry, were all sworn into the office of churchwardens for this parish, before Dr. Phillimore, thus leaving the dispute to be settled by the legal proceedings now in progress.

IRELAND.

THE NEW TRIAL MOTION.

At mid-day on Friday Mr. McDonough concluded his address on behalf of Mr. Barrett, when the Attorney-General commenced his reply and continued until the close of the Court. On Saturday morning the learned gentleman returned his argument, and concluded at half-past 5. The Court then adjourned until Monday.

The appearance of the Court on Monday morning presented many of the features that made it so remarkable during the progress of the trial. The Court and its precincts were crowded; whilst the same order and the same excellent regulation as to the admission to the trial were maintained. The curiosity of the public was not diminished by the knowledge of the fact, which soon transpired, that the judges had been in chamber before ten in the morning, and as the commencement was delayed much beyond the usual hour of the usual period, it began to be suspected that there was some truth in the rumour that the judges were equally divided as to the motion for a new trial. Although Mr. Justice Perrin was first on the bench, all seemed as calm as usual, it must be affirmed of his colleagues, that they looked like persons who had been engaged in a very serious, if not an angry controversy. The cheeks of Mr. Justice Perrin were decked with more lively crimson spots of excitement, while Mr. Justice Crampton, who was ghostly pale, inhaled his breath heavily, and bit often his tongue, it trembling, nether lip. These were seated but a short time when the Chief Justice came blandly forward, and Mr. Justice—took his seat, and at last gazed on his brethren and the counsel and auditory before him, he looked sad and frowning.

A motion of course was being heard, for it was junior day, when, without waiting for its conclusion,

The Chief Justice said, Mr. Attorney-General.

The Attorney-General immediately rose.

The Chief Justice continued: Mr. Attorney-General, I am sorry to inform you that it is Court that they can not give judgment in the—(his lordship paused for an instant)—in the case, until next term.

Scarcely were those words expressed, when the Attorney-General dropped as it were almost imperceptibly back into his seat, men gazed at each other and smiles—and then an universal shout took place from the courts.

There was a rumour prevalent about the Hall that the Judges of the Queen's Bench intend, before delivering judgment, to consult with their brethren in the other courts. This may have arisen from the fact of the Chief Justice being visited in chambers by his brother, Baron Pennefather. Some suppose it to have reference to the "opinion" on the Kilkenny toll, ordered to be given by the House of Commons.

CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT.

The seventh session of the present mayoralty commenced on Monday morning before Sir Kenrick, the Lord Mayor, the sheriffs, and other civic authorities. The calendar contained a list of 174 prisoners. The Recorder briefly charged the Grand Jury, and said, that there was nothing particular either in the number of the offences or the circumstances of them, to call for any lengthened remarks from him. One or two cases of misdemeanour, which had been postponed since the last session, were then called on; but owing to the absence of the witnesses, no some of the defendants not being surrendered, they were unable to be proceeded with. A long delay then occurred, in consequence of the time occupied in reading over the list previous to entering upon the charges preferred against the prisoners, which should have been concluded in a few trifling charges, and adjourned until ten o'clock next day.

WEDNESDAY.

Mr. Baron Alderson took his seat upon the bench in this court at ten o'clock, and immediately afterwards William Cronch, the man who stands charged with the murder of his wife, at Marylebone, was placed at the bar. The prisoner appeared very much pale and care-worn, and appeared to have suffered a great deal since he has been in custody.

This indictment charged the prisoner with having unlawfully made an assault upon Frances Cronch, and with a razor inflicted a mortal wound upon her throat, of which she died, and that he did thereby feloniously kill and murder her.

The prisoner was also charged with the offence of murder upon the coroner's inquisition.

Mr. Parry conducted the prosecution, and Mr. Clarkson appeared for the prisoner.

The learned counsel stated the facts under which the charge was made against the prisoner, but as they were so recently detailed in this paper, on the occasion of the inquest being held at the police office, it is unnecessary to repeat them here. The case for the prosecution having closed, Mr. Clarkson addressed the jury, and after remarking upon the circumstances under which the offence was committed, said that the defence he was instructed to make on behalf of the unfortunate prisoner, was, that at the time he committed the dreadful deed, he was in such a state of mind as to render him not accountable for his actions.

Several witnesses were then called, who deposed to various acts of distraction on the part of the prisoner. It appeared that he had been sent to the Devon and Exeter Hospital whilst living in the capacity of groom with Sir Laurence Peel, and that he had received concussion of the brain, after which he was re-peatedly heard by his acquaintances as being "cracked."

The learned judge then summed up, and left the case in the hands of the jury, who retired at four o'clock. They remained in their room for five hours, and after which time, not being able for the adjournment of the court, the Common Sergeant, who was then presiding, directed that they should be sent for; and he inquired whether there was any probability of their agreeing to a verdict in a reasonable time.

The foreman said he did not think there was, and the jury were then locked up for the night. On Thursday morning, at 10 o'clock, Mr. Justice Coltman having taken his seat, the jury were again brought into court, but not having agreed, they were again sent back to their room, and Baron Alderson was sent for in order to read over his notes of the evidence to the jury. In the meantime several of the jury complained of great exhaustion, not having had anything to eat or drink for 32 hours.

Mr. Justice Coltman said, he could not at present order the jury any refreshment whatever. He was bound to refuse the request. Shortly after, his lordship sent for the surgeon to the gaol, and requested him to visit the jury; on his return, he reported that they required supper.

The prisoner was again placed at the bar; he appeared dreadfully agitated and distressed.

In a few minutes his lordship sent for the jury, who again entered the court.

Mr. Straight.—Gentlemen, are you now agreed on your verdict?

The Foreman.—Gentlemen, we are not.

Mr. Baron Alderson not having arrived, the jury once more retired; but had not been absent many minutes, when Mr. Baron Alderson arrived, and they were again conducted into court. On their entering the box,

Mr. Baron Alderson.—I suppose, gentlemen, your difficulty in agreeing to a verdict arises in respect to the prisoner's state of mind.

The Foreman.—Yes, my lord, and we wish to hear the evidence again read over.

The learned Judge read over the whole of the evidence taken on the trial, and remarked on hearing a portion of his lordship observed, the only question in the case was, did the prisoner, at the time he committed the act, know right from wrong? Was he a responsible agent? That was the question they had to satisfy their minds on, and decide.

The jury again retired, and remained in deliberation.

Shortly before two o'clock, the jury again came into court, and the prisoner having once more placed at the bar,

The Clerk of the Arraigns said—Gentlemen, are you agreed on your verdict?

Foreman.—Yes. At this moment the greatest silence prevailed in the court, which was densely crowded; the prisoner suffering great mental agony.

Clerk of the Arraigns.—How say you—Is William Crouch guilty of the murder, or not guilty?

Foreman.—Guilty.

Clerk of the Arraigns.—In that verdict you are all agreed?

Foreman.—Yes.

The prisoner, on being asked if he had anything to say why judgment of death should not be passed upon him, according to law, made no reply.

Proclamation for silence having been made in the usual form,

Mr. Baron Alderson put on the black cap, and having addressed the prisoner in most impressive terms on the enormity of the offence he had committed, concluded by passing on him the sentence of death.

The prisoner was then removed from the dock. On his leaving, he faintly ejaculated "I am an innocent man."

The jury then requested, after their long, anxious, and distressing inquiry, they might be allowed to return to their homes.

Mr. Baron Alderson: Certainly, gentlemen; and your attendance will be dispensed with during the remainder of the present sessions.

The jury, most of whom appeared nearly exhausted, then retired.

THE POLICE AND THE GAMBLING-HOUSES.

On Wednesday morning, shortly before one o'clock, a very determined attack was made by the police upon a number of gambling-houses, situate in Bury-street, Ashenden-street, St. James's-street, and other neighbourhoods. By a pre-concerted arrangement, in pursuance of orders from the commissioners of the metropolitan police, a body of policemen, from several divisions of the force, were ordered to be in readiness between seven and twelve o'clock on Tuesday night, to proceed to a certain destination which was unknown to the men, but which was eventually found to be that they were to be employed in making a simultaneous assault upon the several gambling-houses at the west end of the town which were of the worst character. The divisions selected upon this affair were the A, the B, the C, the D, the E, the G, the H, the N, the P, and the R, under the orders of Superintendents May, Hughes, and Pierce, the Inspectors Thatcher and Penny, &c., with several sergeants. The men, on leaving their respective stations, were supplied with sledge-hammers, crow-bars, &c., for the purpose of obtaining an immediate entrance. Upon the divisions reaching the houses that were to be entered, an attack was at once made upon the doors, and admission obtained. The police then promptly rushed up the stairs into the different rooms. In some of the houses the gambling was going on, whilst in the house of the police entering being heard, a general attempt was made to escape. The police, however, succeeded in capturing several persons, and also getting possession of the rouge et noir tables, the ice tables, the cues, &c. &c., when these, with the prisoners of the police, were taken to the station-house of the C division in Vine-street, where they were safely lodged.

On Wednesday morning the accused parties were brought up before the magistrate at Marlborough-street police-office. On the bench we noticed Lord Montford, Lord Dillon, and other noblemen and gentlemen, and the churchwardens of the parish of St. James. The hearing of the case occupied seven hours.

The first case heard was against the gaming-house, No. 69, Jermyn-street, commonly called "The Cottage." William Scully, Joseph Jones, William Reeves, George Williams, and William Leech, were placed at the bar, the two former charged Canty with being the manager of the house, and Everett, the porter, with being found in the house for an unlawful purpose. Mr. Wilkins attended for the defendants, Superintendent Baker, of the C division, stated the orders that he had received from the Commissioners of Police, and detailed the facts of the entry and capture. Canty was fined £50, or three months' imprisonment; Everett was fined £20, or three months' imprisonment; and the others, who were only in the house for the purpose of play, £2 each, or 21 days' imprisonment. Mr. Wilkins announced his intention of appeal on behalf of Canty and Everett, who he said were provided with bail.

The second case was against John Jones, John Wilmot and John Haywood Harris, charged as gambling-keepers, No. 28, Regent-street.—The solicitor for the defendants contended that there was no case against his clients. The house was a restaurateur's, and any person could go in for refreshments. The house had been open contrary to the Act of Parliament.—Mr. Hardwick considered that the house for an unlawful purpose, and fined them £3 each.

Third Case—Henry Richardson, Henry Seymour (two very showily dressed persons), Charles M'Foy (a seaman), and John Jones, charged with being in the gaming-house, No. 12, Bury-street, St James's, at one o'clock. Considerable merriment was created by seeing Leobitter in such a situation, and the bench joined in the laugh. It was, however, proved that he and Wilson were only smoking a cigar each in the shop, which is a tobacconist's (as a blind), and they were discharged.—Superintendent Hughes produced a roulette-table, a hazard-table, 3 dice, and other implements, which had been seized in one of the rooms of the house devoted to play, and which it had required the united efforts of himself and men to get at, as there were four iron-bound doors in their way, which required great strength and patience to force open. Cripps, Jones, and Canty were found in the rooms when they effected an entrance.—Mr. Wilkins would not struggle with the case, but leave it in the magistrate's hands.—Mr. Hardwick said he should inflict the same penalty as on the others who were found in the gaming-house, viz. £3 each or 21 days' imprisonment.

The remainder of the charges were of a similar description. Two cases were dismissed, and the delinquents in the others fined 20s. each.

The Grenadier Guards had a practice day on Monday morning in Hyde Park; Prince Edward of Saxe Weimar left Marlborough House at 8 o'clock, to do duty with his regiment.

ACCIDENT TO ADMIRAL SIR J. HAWKINS WHITSHED, BART.—This venerable officer, while crossing Hanover-square, on Sunday evening, was knocked down by a gentleman's gig, and run over. He was instantly picked up, and conveyed to his residence in Cavendish-square. Mr. Copeland and Mr. Hall, surgeons, attended Sir Hawkins, and, we are happy to state, that in a few hours he was found to be quite as well as could be expected after so alarming an extent as was at first anticipated. He is in his 84th year.

DESTRUCTIVE FIRE IN SHOE-LANE.—On Wednesday morning, at half-past three o'clock, an alarming fire broke out in the lower part of the house of Mr. Lescombe, a glass manufacturer, Shoe-lane, nearly opposite the London National Schools. The police ran instantly to Farringdon-street, where they procured fire-feeders, and hastened onward to rescue the inmates; and in three or four minutes the engines were on the spot, followed by the West of England; but the firemen, although well supplied with water, could save but a small portion of the stock. The premises of Messrs. Pontifex and Co., as well as several small houses at the back, were alone saved through the instrumentality of the assistance rendered by the neighbours. The family all rescued, but saved not a particle of clothing. The fire was not extinguished till half-past four, when several of the engines left for another fire in Pall-mall.

On Tuesday Mr. Wakley held an inquest at Hampton Court on the remains of a child found in the drain of the palace. The mutilated body was displayed to the coroner and jury, presented a sickening sight. There was no clue to the offender. Verdict, "Wilful murder against some person unknown."

[The following appeared only in our late edition of last week.]

SURRENDER OF DALMAS, THE MURDERER.

MARYLEBONE POLICE COURT.—On Saturday morning, about an hour before the opening of the court, a considerable crowd of persons had assembled in the passages leading thereto, in consequence of its being known that Dalmas, the murderer of the woman M'Farlane, had surrendered himself in the course of the night at the D station of police, Marylebone, and that he would, at the commencement of the business, be placed at the bar before the sitting magistrate, Mr. Long. The anxiously expectant crowd were, however, doomed to disappointment, inasmuch as the prisoner was, by authority of the police commissioners, who were consulted shortly after the surrender of the murderer, conveyed, at ten o'clock in the morning, to Wandsworth police-court, that being the district in which the appalling deed was perpetrated. Every precaution was used with the view of ensuring the safe transit of the prisoner to his destination; and in conformity with orders emanating from superintendant Hughes, of the D division, he was conveyed from Marylebone station-house in a cab, handcuffed to Sergeant Camming; another officer was also in the vehicle, which was driven off at a sharp pace, followed some distance by upwards of 200 persons who had congregated in front of the station. The prisoner looked exceedingly pale and dejected, and was evidently most anxious to avoid the gaze of those by whom he was surrounded.

EXAMINATION AND REMAND OF THE PRISONER, AT WANDSWORTH.

It is unnecessary to give the evidence taken before Mr. Clive, the magistrate, as it was almost verbatim the same as that given before the coroner's jury. Mr. Carter, the coroner, was present.

Charlotte Georgiana Dalmas was called. The instant she entered the court and beheld her father in the person of the prisoner at the bar, she fell back fainting into the chair. Some water was given her, and she partially recovered; but the instant she again beheld her father she went into hysterics, and screamed in the most heart-rending manner. It was, consequently, found necessary to remove her from the court, and proceed with the evidence of another witness. She was not recalled.

The prisoner, on seeing the sufferings of his daughter, wiped the tears from his eyes, but immediately afterwards became perfectly composed.

At the termination of the evidence of each witness the prisoner was asked by Mr. Clive if he wished to say anything, but each time replied, "Nothing," until Mr. Connor had given his testimony.

When the prisoner asked him if it was possible that a woman could have walked so far as had been represented after having her throat cut?

Mr. Connor replied that it was.

The police constable and Mr. Gosling, the landlord of the Swan, having been examined, Inspector Busain applied for a remand.

After some consultation with the clerks, Mr. Clive (addressing the prisoner) said—I am disposed to remand you until next Friday; do you wish to say anything?

Prisoner: No; not at present.

The witnesses were then taken into another room to give their depositions, and the prisoner was subsequently removed to Horsemonger-lane

The Rev. Mr. Townsend of Wandsworth has not been in such a state of excitement for many years; the vicinity of the police-court was crowded with persons anxious to obtain a sight of the prisoner.

POSTSCRIPT.

THE BATTERSEA MURDER.

The adjourned examination of Dalmas took place yesterday Friday at Wandsworth. We have received a detailed report, but think it unnecessary to give it at length, as it produced little material that has not already been made public at the inquest.

The prisoner was brought from Horsemonger-lane at an early hour.

The first witness examined was his daughter, Charlotte Georgiana; but her evidence was not very material, she only deposing to the depressed state of his mind when he called to see her, the forenoon of the murder. His unhappiness, she said, arose from his being out of a situation—he had been out of employment some time. She was placed, while under examination, in such a position as not to see the prisoner. She, however, denied some of her former statements as to her leaving out by her father, and explained, that she was not then "in a right state of mind."

Ellen Gibson, a single woman, living at 1, Culmstock-terrace, Battersea, sister of the murdered woman, after deposing to the circumstances of the murder, already so repeatedly described, then proceeded:—I knew Dalmas for several years; he has been in the habit of visiting my sister's house. I have known him intimately since the death of his wife, in June. Previously we never used to speak. The prisoner had been paying his addresses to my sister for some months past. The last time I saw him at her house was on Easter Tuesday.

The following witnesses were then examined: George French, a lad of 12; Sarah Anne Hide, Augusta Dalmas (prisoner's daughter), Elizabeth Shapley, and Mary Ann Williamson. They added very little of any material consequence to what has been published already.

Fifteen witnesses—Elizabeth Meighan, 94, Church-street, Chelsea; Richard Parsons, keeper of the sewer-shop William the Fourth, in the King's-road; and Edmund Rogers, waiter at the White Hart, Duke-street, Chelsea—gave evidence, respectively, as to the prisoner and the murdered woman having been together shortly before the murder.

Mr. Clive then remanded the prisoner until next day.

The solemn composition of the prisoner was most remarkable than at the first examination. He stood at the bar regarding the witnesses as they gave their testimony, with all the indifference of an ordinary spectator.

Friday, the 24th instant, is her Majesty's birthday, when the Sovereign will complete her 25th year.

DEATH OF THE HON. EDWARD A. GRANT.—The Hon. A. Grant, youngest son of the Earl of Seafield, died at Cullen House on Friday last. He was only in his 4th year.

LADY LEGARD.—By the [illegible] Lady Legard, of Ganton, Yorkshire, are placed in mourning. Her ladyship died at her seat in Devon on Monday last, in her 66th year. In 1806 she married Lord Charles Somerset, the third son of the present Duke of Beaufort, created in the following year Baron Legard. A title which she only enjoyed for a year after his father to whom he died in 1810. The late Lady Legard was widow of Mr. Thomas Legard, of Ganton, Yorkshire.

The Hon. Mr. Commissioner Spring Rice, and the Hon. Captain Percy, Commissioner of Excise, have gone to Kilkenny, county Donegal, on official business connected with the Excise department.

Colonel Maberly, Secretary to the Post Office, is in Paris on official business connected with his department.

CONVICTS FOR TRANSPORTATION.—On Saturday commenced (at Leigh Sotheby's) the 16 days' sale of the Library of the late Robert Southey, LL.D., Poet Laureate. There are nearly 6000 lots, many of them necessarily consisting of several volumes. The Library is rich and valuable in Spanish, Modern works Latin, French, Italian, Portuguese, and English predominating.

FANCY SALE, WILLIS'S ROOMS.—On Thursday the first day's sale of our fancy bazaar commenced, which was held at the above place, on behalf of the Asylum for Female Orphans, and the three to lowing societies: The Church Missionary Society, the London Society for Promoting Christianity amongst the Jews, and the Protestant Association. The sale continued from noon to five o'clock. The rooms were well attended by persons of distinction.

MAY MEETINGS.—The anniversary meetings of the Congregational Union of England and Wales, Rev. Dr. Harris, in the chair, the Colonial Missionary chaired by J. R. Mills; Church of Scotland Missions, chairman Sir George Rose; were held yesterday, when the usual business was gone through, and reports presented. Numerous meetings are announced for this month.

HYDE-PARK CORNER.—As many complaints have been lately made regarding the inconvenience felt by the crashing of vehicles entering Hyde-park through the several gates, we understand that a meeting was held between Rowan, one of the metropolitan police commissioners, on the subject. For the future all carriages going out at the Park will be obliged to pass through the middle gate. Those coming from the direction of Knightsbridge will still enter the Park at the gate next the first-mentioned locality; and those coming from Piccadilly, the gate among Apsley House.

BURNING OF A FLOATING HOUSE BY ORDER OF THE LORD MAYOR.—Yesterday morning, at four o'clock, by order of the Lord Mayor, Inspector Walter and about twenty constables of the City police proceeded in a body to Fountayne's Hall Wharf, and, having obtained the assistance of some labourers, unfastened the mooring chains, and removed the platform connected with the Waterman's floating pier, recently placed there, and which has been so badly complained of by the inhabitants of Queenhithe ward, by which means it stops through London-bridge on the City side. This having been done, a steamer, who had been provided, towed the floating lighter clear from the wharf, thus removing the nuisance. The whole was done decently and quietly, which is doubtless attributable to the judicious selection of so early an hour.

POLICE.—BOW-STREET.—SERIOUS ROBBERY AND ARSON IN A DWELLING-HOUSE.—Yesterday (Saturday) morning, Mr. Ingleby, solicitor, of Bedford-row, charged a respectably-dressed young man, named Edward Youngman Lofton, in the service of [illegible] Esq., of Bedford-row, with having broken open a writing-desk, and stolen up and inspector Pearce, of the A division, charged him with committing a robbery in the mansion of his master, and then setting fire to the house, in hopes of consuming the proofs of his guilt. A young woman, named Henrietta Smith, was charged as accessory, and brought up by another officer of the A division. Both were apprehended at the Bull public-house, Pancuden Heath, near Maidstone, on Thursday night. Mr. Driver had left his house in Parliament-street a few days since to go into the country, and had left the house in the care of the male prisoner. On Sunday night last, the male prisoner, who sleeps in the butler's pantry, went to bed at the same time as the other servants. He was awoken in the night by a noise, and, on getting up, passing the house, discovered smoke issuing from the shutters of the pantry window. She immediately rang the area-bell and the chamber-bells, and the servants got up, the house being filled with smoke. The prisoner was not seen for some time, and he jumped into the area, and broke open the pantry-window, when the flames issued forth. He then got into the house, and broke open the pantry-door, which was locked, but the flames came out so strong that he could not go in, and he sent for the engines, and the Fire Brigade extinguished the flames. The prosecutor arrived at home at nine o'clock at night, and did not for some time suspect the prisoner, as he went up into his library and unlocked a drawer, where he kept a bag of money, and found it was gone. After considering how the drawer could have been unlocked, he recollected that in a large chest in the butler's pantry there were duplicate keys for all the drawers in the house, and he went to the bath, and although much burnt, he found it had been broken open. The prisoner, a cough list in charge of the house by his master, had disappeared on the same night, and was not seen after he went to bed. On the male prisoner being searched, the key of the pantry was found in his pocket, and the money found on the female prisoner was identified as belonging to the prosecutor. The prisoners were remanded until a future day.

FATAL ACCIDENT.—On Tuesday night, shortly before eight o'clock, as a lad, fourteen years of age, named Robert Mitchell was playing with others of his acquaintance upon some barges in one of the docks at Shadwell, he slipped, and he fell into the Thames. John Russel, one of the bargemen belonging to a west country boat, hearing the splash, immediately rushed out of his cabin, and after about a quarter of an hour's search, discovered the body, which he hauled out of the water, a dead by City police-constable 419. Deceased was the son of a tinman and brazier residing in Nicholas-lane.

SOCIETY FOR THE PROPAGATION OF THE GOSPEL IN FOREIGN PARTS.

Probably, the most impressive commemoration in the Metropolis, in the month of May—and, therefore, popularly termed one of "the May Meetings"—is the preaching, in St. Paul's Cathedral, of the Anniversary Sermon in aid of the funds of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts. Upon this very important occasion, the Right Hon. the Lord Mayor proceeds in state to the Cathedral, attended by a number of the civic corporation, and is there met by the President (the Archbishop of Canterbury), and the corporation of the above society, in full canonicals. This year the anniversary was held on Thursday, the 2nd instant, when, as the Archbishop of Canterbury subsequently stated, the Lord Mayor attended at church with a larger number of the corporation than his grace had ever the satisfaction of seeing on any former occasion of a similar character. In the engraving at the foot of the annexed page, our artist has represented the meeting of the ecclesiastical and civic procession at the choir of the splendid cathedral. The sermon was preached by the Lord Bishop of Hereford.

PRESENTATION OF "THE LOVING CUP," AT THE MANSION HOUSE.

In the evening, the Lord Mayor, according to custom, entertained at the Mansion House the prelates of the church, who were called together by the occasion with a brilliant assemblage of lay guests. The company, comprising a numerous collection of ladies, sat down to a splendid entertainment, at six o'clock. The show of gold and silver plate, of every description, was superb, and the Egyptian Hall, which was opened on the occasion for the first time for festive purposes, during the present Mayoralty, presented a most magnificent appearance, having been thoroughly repainted, and the gilding of the capitals and entablature of the massive Corinthian columns renewed. In the vicinity of the chair we noticed the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Archbishop of Armagh, the Bishop of London, the Bishops of Winchester, Bangor, Carlisle, Llandaff, Ripon, Salisbury, Hereford, Worcester, and Lichfield, and the Bishop of Newfoundland; Archdeacons Hale, Robinson, Hamilton, and Manning; the Rev. Drs. Spry, Russell, Croly, Birch, Burnett; Sir George Hayter, R.A.; the Rev. Drs. Mile and Harrison, chaplains to the Archbishop of Canterbury; Aldermen Sir C. Hunter, Bart., Brown, Lucas, Sir John Key, Bart., Farebrother, Wilson, Thomas Johnson, Sir John Pirie, Bart.; the Hon. C. E. Law, M.P., Recorder; Aldermen Wood, Gibbs, John Johnson, Sir George Carroll, Hooper, Farncomb, Challis, and Hughes; Sheriff Moon, the Chamberlain, the Common Sergeant, Town Clerk, and several of the principal City officers; John Masterman, Esq., M.P.; R. H. Pigeon, Esq.; Messrs. Baldwin, Capel, Delrayn, Manning, Alsager, &c.

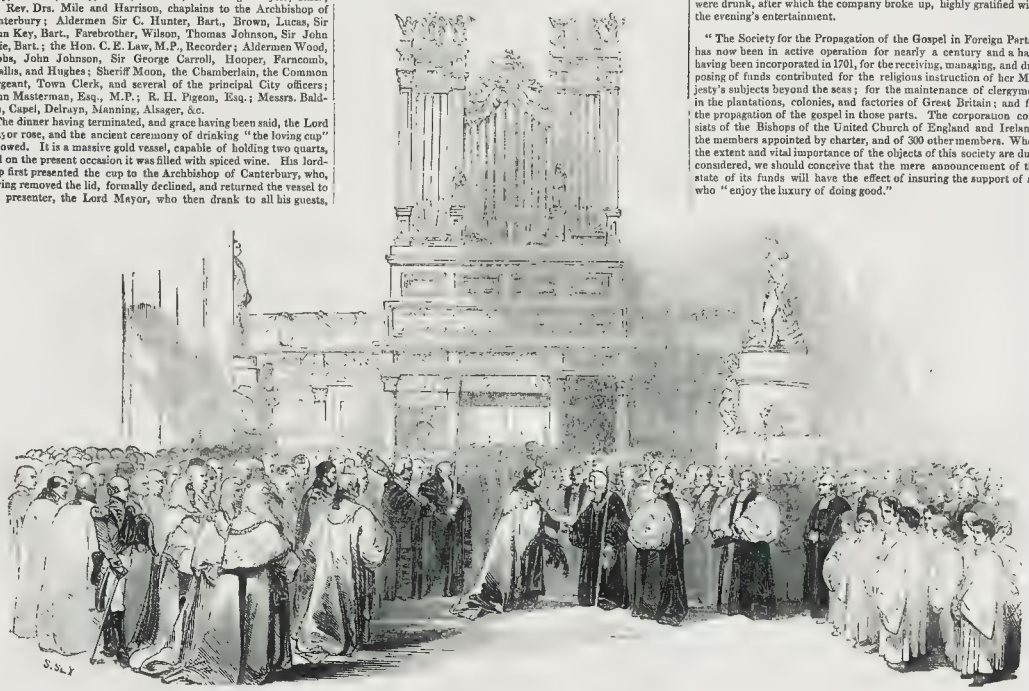
The dinner having terminated, and grace having been said, the Lord Mayor rose, and the ancient ceremony of drinking "the loving cup" followed. It is a massive gold vessel, capable of holding two quarts, and on the present occasion it was filled with spiced wine. His lordship first presented the cup to the Archbishop of Canterbury, who, having removed the lid, formally declined, and returned the vessel to the presenter, the Lord Mayor, who then drank to all his guests, bidding them a hearty welcome. Of this interesting scene of civic etiquette we present our readers with a correct representation. As soon as the last words were pronounced, the room was on a sudden brilliantly illuminated with gas, the effect of which, with the hall in its renovated splendour, elicited expressions of approbation from all present.

The Lord Mayor having proposed "The health of the Archbishop of Canterbury, and of the Prelates and Divines present, and prosperity to the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts," the Archbishop of Canterbury returned thanks in an eloquent address, in which he strongly advocated the claims of the Society to support. This support, his grace observed, had of late been insufficient; but he was happy to observe a growing disposition to encourage the Society; and he trusted that ensuing years would demonstrate that these indications were not fallacious, and thus an undertaking of so much importance to the good of our fellow-countrymen residing in the colonies, and of the benighted races who bordered upon those colonies, and also of such consequence to the interests of the empire at large, would be carried to a triumphant issue. We would thus further what he considered to be the design of Providence in giving us an extent of dominion, and a preponderating political and moral influence in the world, which have never been enjoyed by any other race or country (Hear, hear.) Before sitting down he would, with the permission of those present, propose, "The health of the Lord Mayor," adding that it was with great satisfaction that that opportunity was afforded him of expressing his respect for the ancient City of London, and of testifying that respect in proposing the health of its chief magistrate, acknowledging, as he did with pleasure, the ability and integrity with which he performed the duties of his office, and also bearing a ready and merited testimony as to his personal worth.

The Lord Mayor returned thanks, and then gave "The health of the Lord Primate of Ireland;" and the Archbishop of Armagh, in returning thanks, claimed the support of his lordship and of all present, for the Irish Church, as an important part of the Church catholic of the realm.—"The health of the Bishop of London and the other Bishops and Divines present" was then proposed, and duly acknowledged by the Right Rev. Prelate, who said that there was no class of men on whom the society, whose anniversary they were that day celebrating, had a stronger claim for countenance and support than on those merchants and men of business, who were more or less connected, in their commercial character, with the distant and benighted regions, for the moral enlightenment of which it had been originally instituted.

His lordship then proposed "The Health of the Lord Bishop of Hereford," by whom the anniversary sermon had that day been delivered. The right rev. prelate returned thanks. Several other toasts were drunk, after which the company broke up, highly gratified with the evening's entertainment.

"The Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts" has now been in active operation for nearly a century and a half, having been incorporated in 1701, for the receiving, managing, and disposing of funds contributed for the religious instruction of her Majesty's subjects beyond the seas; for the maintenance of clergymen in the plantations, colonies, and factories of Great Britain; and for the propagation of the gospel in those parts. The corporation consists of the Bishops of the United Church of England and Ireland, the members appointed by charter, and of 300 other members. When the extent and vital importance of the objects of this society are duly considered, we should conceive that the mere announcement of the state of its funds will have the effect of insuring the support of all who "enjoy the luxury of doing good."



ANNIVERSARY MEETING OF THE CIVIC AUTHORITIES AND THE METROPOLITAN CLERGY, IN ST. PAUL'S CATHEDRAL.

OPENING OF THE RAILWAY CONNECTING THE MANCHESTER AND LIVERPOOL WITH THE MANCHESTER AND LEEDS LINES.

On Saturday morning last was opened the important connecting link of the long chain of railway communication between Liverpool and the northern parts of England and Scotland. Our readers will remember that we briefly described, in our journal, last January, the opening of a part of the Leeds railway, which brought that line down to the Hunt's Bank terminus, much nearer to the Exchange, and the more important parts of Manchester, than did the Station in Oldham-road. The junction we are now about to describe is a continuation of that line to the terminus of the Bolton, Preston, and Lancaster Railway, at Salford, and thence to near that of the Manchester and Liverpool road, thus forming an unbroken line of railway conveyance from Liverpool, through Manchester, to Leeds, York, the whole of the eastern coast, Newcastle-upon-Tyne, and, very shortly, to Edinburgh herself.

The line from Hunt's Bank crosses the road at Strangeways, by an iron bridge of about 82 feet span; and then the river Irwell by another bridge (which our sketch illustrates), of from 115 to 120 feet span; and thence, by a series of arches, to the New Bailey station, at Salford; where it joins the Preston and Lancaster Line. The new road then is carried on over an iron viaduct, supported by massive cast-iron pillars of Egyptian architecture, running parallel with the Preston line for about 200 yards, and then, keeping to the left, over brick and stone arches, some of them of exquisite workmanship, to its junction, just beyond the Bolton canal, with the Manchester and Liverpool railroad. The whole distance from Hunt's Bank to this place is a mile and a few yards. In passing over this new line, the passenger is astonished to find himself flying, as it were, over the tops of the houses of half Salford, and such is nearly the fact; for the line goes directly across the town, over Greengate, Chapel-street, and New Bailey-street, and the numerous smaller streets lying between these great thoroughfares: and that, too, at an elevation equal to most, and higher than many of the houses situated in this densely peopled neighbourhood.

There was little ceremony in the opening, except that the engines were dressed with flags during the early part of the day. The completion of this junction is very important not only for its concentration of the place of starting from, and of arriving at, for nearly all the railways to and from Manchester; but thus it opens a continuous line of railway for the conveyance of not only passengers, but for the raw and manufactured material, to and from the most important points of our island. Extensive arrangements have been made by the Directors for the convenience of so large an addition of passengers to the station as this junction and general terminus naturally produces.

IRON BRIDGE, MANCHESTER AND LEEDS RAILWAY.

ROYAL VISIT TO THE EXHIBITION OF THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

On Friday, the 3rd inst., the Queen and Prince Albert honoured the exhibition of the Royal Academy, in Trafalgar-square, with a visit. Her Majesty and his Royal Highness arrived at the Academy from Buckingham Palace shortly before 1 o'clock, attended by the Duchess of Buccleuch, Mistress of the Robes, and the Marchioness of Douro, Lady in Waiting. The Hon. Miss Hamilton and the Hon. Miss Stanley, Maids of Honour in Waiting, and the Earl of Hardwicke, Lord in Waiting, followed in a second royal carriage; and the Equerries in Waiting, Colonels Buckley and Wylde, occupied another royal carriage.

Sir Martin Archer Shea, President of the Royal Academy, received the illustrious visitors on their arrival, and conducted her Majesty and his Royal Highness through the different schools. The Lord Chamberlain, the Master of the Horse, and the Groom of the Stole to Prince Albert, were also in attendance.

At 2 o'clock, the Queen and Prince Albert, attended by the royal suite, left the Academy and returned to Buckingham Palace.

Our engraving represents the royal party in the Hall of the Gallery; this portion of the edifice is, altogether, a pleasing composition, and the redeeming grace of this un-national structure.

THE EXHIBITION OF THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

This exhibition of the pictures painted by members of the Royal Academy, and by those contributors who send their works to the Gallery under their auspices, is, on the whole, a good one. There are no pictures of the very highest order of excellence, or at least very few, and these must be considered only in reference to the class to which they belong, and not in relation to art taken generally. Thus, there are some few, very few, cabinet pictures, some miniatures, and a conversational picture or two, which are entitled to the highest praise, as works sui generis, but which rather decorate and enliven, than dignify or exalt art, and certainly cannot be said to belong to what is called, and called justly, high art.

In the department of sculpture and marbles, there are some of the best busts ever produced by English sculptors; some that may challenge, with confidence, a comparison with the very best busts of foreign artists; and there are several figures and groups which are exquisitely beautiful. Amongst the busts there is a cast of O'Connell, and a marble bust of Lady Talbot, which are eminently deserving of notice. These, we understand, are by a new hand in this department of art—Mr. Jones, of Cannon-row—who is said to be a self-taught artist, and certainly his creations are most racy, and bear the stamp of undoubted genius.

There is not a sufficiency of these last-mentioned works to place English art so high as it ought to reach, or to cause any particular exultation at what the Gallery presents. Nevertheless, this exhibition—the seventy-sixth since the establishment of the Royal Academy—may be said to be, if taken as a whole, a good one. The aggregate merit of the pictures will form a good sum-total of genius, talent, industry, and knowledge; and the English school will not suffer from this display of pictures, if compared with the exhibitions of modern pictures on the Continent, in the judgment of men of taste and of unprejudiced critics.

It is to be regretted that there are so many portraits, and so few historical or biographical pictures; but for this regret the public must take the blame upon themselves; artists must live, like other people; and if the means of living are to be more readily acquired by administering to the vanity of those by whom they are employed, than by painting pictures from which instruction and genuine taste might be derived, nobody can quarrel with those who take advantage of the folly to support and uphold themselves.

Having made these few preliminary observations, we will at once proceed to specify those pictures which, in our judgment, deserve a more palpable notice; there may, very probably, be some which we ought to mention honourably, which we may have overlooked or passed unheededly, but when it is remembered that many pictures are hung in such bad situations, and in such deficient lights, that it is impossible to estimate their merits or defects, and that during the week since the exhibition has been opened to the public, the gallery has been so completely crowded with company that a view could only be obtained by jostling and pushing through hundreds of gazers, our readers must excuse any omissions on our part, and the artists whom we have not named must accept our apology for what is only seeming neglect of their pictures.

THE CHINESE SUMMER-HOUSE, BUCKINGHAM PALACE GARDENS.

THE CHINESE SUMMER-HOUSE, BUCKINGHAM PALACE GARDENS.

The exhibition at the Royal Academy of three of the finished studies for the frescoes ordered by her Majesty for the embellishment of the Chinese Summer-house in Buckingham Palace Gardens, having called public attention to that building, we have prepared a view of it, which will, we hope, enable our readers more readily to understand the circumstances under which these—our first English frescoes—will be seen.

The Summer-house is a small octagonal structure, which crowns the summit of an artificial hill, built without any design to be richly decorated; and, therefore, not calculated for the proper display of the treasure it contains. The light is obtained from a lattice door and four small latticed windows, and does not fall happily on the pictures. The style of architecture is in accordance with the architect's whim; at least it belongs to no order; this may be no very serious objection, considering that it was intended to be little more than a garden seat; but it is an evil, now that it is likely to become an object of universal interest and attraction. The one room of which it consists (we take no account of two small apartments behind, and the aviary, which forms an underground floor, falling with the hill) is, as we have said, octagonal—but an irregular octagon; two of the eight sides being much larger than the other six. From these eight sides run up to a point in the roof, sixteen compartments; each of these compartments being occupied with a design in arabesque by Mr. Agho, which that gentleman has executed in encaustic.

The encaustic colours are very brilliant; the frescoes are, on the contrary, somewhat dull; so that the glaring hues of Mr. Agho go far to kill the tones of Mr. Leslie and Mr. Maclise, while Mr. Agho himself sustains much injury by their neighbourhood; for in his designs he has introduced several figures, semi-human; and has been placed at a manifest disadvantage in being seen in juxtaposition with the first artists of the age. This is an evil which time will not remedy; but as the interior of the building is not quite finished, much may yet be done to give the frescoes "fair play."

The poem illustrated is "The Masque of Comus;" and the frescoes are (or rather are to be) in number eight; the artists charged with their execution being Messrs. Eastlake, Leslie, Stanfield, Maclise, Etty, Uwins, E. Landseer, and Sir William Ross. Mr. Eastlake and Mr. Landseer have not commenced theirs; the other six have completed their works; and of these we are enabled to speak in terms of the highest commendation, although we have great fears of the durability of the colours—some of which, we are told, have already sunk in an injurious degree.

The neighbourhood of the Summer-house is enlivened by the presence of a number of foreign birds, which are especial favourites of the Royal children.

HER MAJESTY'S VISIT TO THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

We abstain from any animadversions on what we consider bad pictures. The task of finding fault is not a pleasing one, and knowing the fallibility of our judgment, we refrain from inflicting an injury which might possibly be unmerited, but which, we are fully aware, might be very fatal to the interests of very deserving persons.

EAST ROOM.

No. 10. A very pleasing picture by G. A. Solomon.

11. "Ostend." J. M. W. Turner, R.A. A charming view of the Belgic port, which will at once be recognised by all who have ever seen the original.

13. "The Otter Speared." E. Landseer, R.A. This picture is one of the h ghest in its own nr class of art. It has more power, and less of the faults of the artist, than many of his late pictures.

14. "The Madness of Hercules." G. Patten, R.A. Mr. Patten deserves uncommon for his painted this picture. It has a coarseness and a somewhat of vu garity in the expression, but it is an advance of the artist.

15. "The Ironmaster." J. J. Chalon, R.A. Very pleasing.

30. "Portrait of Mrs. R. Hodgson." J. P. Knight, R.A., elect. A good specimen of the artist's talents.

31. "Scene from Comus." C. R. Leslie, R.A. This is a picture of great merit. Mr. Leslie has, we think, painted the best picture from Comus in this collection.

57. "Portraits of Mr. and Mrs. Webster." T. Webster, A. This is a very clever picture. It represents the happy pair on the fiftieth anniversary of their wedding. It will attract attention, and benefit the artist.

84. "A Life on the Way Home." W. F. Witherington, R.A. A beautiful landscape and figures

18. "Heloise." C. L. Eastlake, R.A. A beautiful picture.

68. "Portrait of the Bishop of Llandaff." One of the best specimens of the President of the Academy.

87 "Portrait of the Queen." F. Newenham. This is one of the best portraits of hitherto paint d of her Majesty. It is a remarkably good likeness, both as to features and character. The colouring is good, and the general treatment happy. The artist is a very clever man, and a rising one 78 "A Stiff Breeze." Sir A. W. Calcott, R.A. This is one of the most beautiful pictures in the gallery; the spectator can almost fancy he beholds the ocean and the vessels that float upon it.

98. "Sir Walter Scott and his Youngest Daughter." Sir W. Allan, R.A. A very clever little picture

94. "The Prodigal Son." W. Gale. The effect of this picture is fine, but it is hurried to high for a proper estimate of its merits to be formed.

96. "Scene from Comus." D. Maclise, R.A. Everything that this artist paints is deserving of notice; this picture is very meritorious; it is deformed by mannerism and a sort of affectation; it wants animation and some other things, nevertheless it is full of breadth, and of a high quality of art.

101 "The Vow of the Hill." T. Creswick, A. Very pleasing

102. "Disappointment." E. Landseer, R.A. A charming picture of a girl and dogs

110. "Portrait of Mrs. Bowyer Smith." F. Grant, A. A fine portrait.

133. "The Backbiter." W. Etty, R.A. This is apparently Eve and the Serpent: it is a splendid piece of colouring

138. "The Whitsuntide Controversy," from the Vicar of Wakefield. W. Mulready, R.A. One of the most beautiful cabinet pictures ever painted; it has all the finish of Teniers, is full of character, and perfect in the details, as well as the general treatment

Morales, an Italian scene Sir A. W. Calcott. The fitting companion to No. 129

140 "A good" Portrait of a Lady." By T. Watson Gordon, A.

141 "Seaford," Sussex W. Collins, R.A. A bright and charming picture

141 "The Catechist." A picture of a different class, but of great merit, by the same artist

162 "Scene from Comus." W. Etty, R.A. A splendid display of female beauties, painted with the peculiar excellence of this fine artist

168 "The Rescue the Daughter of Jairus." E. U. Eddis. A very fine ecclesiastical picture, and one by which the English school of art will be raised high.

170 "Girl with Parrot." D. Maclise, R.A. Very fine

170 "Coast scene—Church of St. Jean, at Caen." D. Roberts, R.A. This is a very excellent picture, drawn the force and truth of the artist.

178 "The Marshalsea of Waterford." F. Grant, A. This is perhaps the best portrait in the collection.

178 "Lucgli, na and Alasco, Maritime Alps." W. Linton. A charming land scape

"The Day after the Wreck" C. Stanfield, R.A. In this picture the artist is shown that the high reputation he has arrived at has been obtained deservedly. It is remarkable for vigour of feeling and truth of delineation.

197. "In the Cathedral at Modena, during the Evening of the Fest"—Morning effect. S. A. Hart, R.A. A very fine picture of an interior, with figures; the lights beautifully managed

200 and 201 "Evening—Landscape and Cattle." J. Wilson, junior. Two beautiful bits, full of nature

"Jessie Daughter Raised." W. Pone's. Very clever.

"Confidence." R. Hannah A picture of a boy singing a doorhell. Very characteristic. There is a fellow to it, 210, "Diffidence," by the same artist, which is scarcely so good

"The Sempstress." R. Redgrave. A very good picture, both as to conception and execution.

MIDDLE ROOM.

"Ryda! Water, Westmoreland" A. Vickers.

"A scene on the Coast of Guernsey." W. E. Dighton.

"The Wedding Morning." R. Dudgeon. A fine picture.

"The Martyrdom of John Brown, of Presmill, 1685." T. Duncan, A These four pictures form a cluster of gems. They are of different merits and different classes, but each of them is good.

"The Sac fice of Noah." T. Mogford. A picture of considerable merit

"A Sea View," by J. M. W. Turner, R.A., to which what has been already said I may refer for this picture may be applied.

"The Pedlar." T. Webster, A. Very clever.

"Fis but a Fancy's Sketch" W. Etty, R.A. A beautiful picture. The person about to be a happy man who possesses so creative a fancy.

"Scene from Uncine." D. Maclise, R.A. A fine piece of drawing and colouring

"The Thames, near Gravesend." A. Vickers. Remarkably beautiful; the water and sky both well toned.

"The Return of the Dove to the Ark." C. Landseer, A. This picture is scarcely in a proper light; it has, however, the merit of correct detail, and is nothing to carry to the high rank which the name of Landseer has obtained.

"Gelt—to the Hay field." A beautiful little picture, by D. Cox.

"A Mountain Torrent." T. Creswick, A. A fine landscape.

"A very high and charging landscape. By E. J. Niemann

"The Hair Family." B. Descreche. The colouring and the composition pictures are both fine. Perhaps more power might have been introduced, however, very fine

"Upper Castle." E. W. Cooke.

"The Painter's Pleasure." F. Danby, A.

"The Outlaw's Return." J. E. Lauder. A cluster of highly meritorious pictures.

"Whilst Taking Leave of the Garden." R. W. Buss. Clever

"Queen Mary Passing Queen Mary's House (Entering Morton to be Carried Out and Shot." From

"Mary Stuart." E. T. Lauder Of its peculiar class, a very fine picture. The drawing, the colouring, and light are bold and effective, the groups well-arranged, and the whole very forcible

"John Knox and Mary Queen of Scots." W. P. Frith. A very clever picture

"Rob Roy's Defiance." R. W. Buss. Two beautiful bits.

"Sleeping." B. Landseer, R.A. The artist has seldom painted a picture, taken as a whole, so masterly as this. The colouring and the blacksmith are rather too clean, and too much in full dress for the occasion, and there is some want in the much of the drawn passion and too little of the urge in the repression; but the great merits of the picture overcome these defects or objections, and show the genius of the painter.

"Louis Philippe." A correct portrait of the French Monarch. By G. P. A. Healy.

"Repose." A very Cuyp-ish landscape. By T. S. Cooper

"Venice." T. M. W. Turner, R.A. Combines the beauties and vagaries of this artist

"Sancho Panza in the Apartment of the Duchess." C. R. Leslie, R.A. This is an admirable picture, a worthy illustration of the genius of Cervantes.

"Landscape." By H. Jutsum. Very clever

"The Lesson." This picture is by a very talented lady, Mrs. M'Ian, and we think a great imitation as an artist

"Sir Thomas More and his Daughter." J. R. Herbert, A. A good picture

"Rebekah." J. P. Pettigrew. Painted in a manner that will extort praise from the spectators.

"Portrait of the Seven Bishops." J. R. Herbert, A. This is so conspicuous a picture that it attracts attention. It has considerable merits; the expression of the heads are good, the colouring, somewhat glaring and spotty, and the composition and grouping are tasteful. In spite of these defects, it exhibits great talent, and deserves encouragement.

WEST ROOM

"I Is Joys Grey Summoned to her Execution." E. D. Leslie. A fine picture of its class, and very well painted in a manner that will extort praise from the spectators.

"Poupied Fie d." F. R. Lee, R.A. A refreshing landscape.

"Venice." By T. W. M. Turner, R.A. Another striking but eccentric picture.

154. "The Pyramids of Gizeh—Sunset." D. Roberts, R.A. A noble landscape. The atmospheric effect, and the immense space described, produce a magnificent and various scene on which we gaze with delight

160 "La Fleur's Departure from Montreuil." E. M. Ward. Very clever, and pleasing.

"Return of a Wounded Soldier" F. Goodhall. A good picture

"Italian Minstrel A Grides. A Exhibited to great praise

"Summer's Afternoon." T. Creswick, A. One of the best landscapes in the Exhibition

"The Gipsy Family." W. Simson. Full of nature, and carefully painted

522. "Resual to the Forum" A. Elmore. [Of this excellent picture we shall next week present our readers with a fine engraving; so that we reserve our remarks to that occasion

523 "A Sea Piece" By Mr. C. Stanfield, R.A. A very masterly performance

Scene from 'Old Mortality.'" J. G. Middleton. This picture will obtain many admirers, and will deserve them.

"The Moors Beleaguered by the Spaniards in the City of Valencia." P. F. Poole. There is great power in some portions of this picture, and parts of it are well drawn and coloured: but, as a whole, it does not equal what this artist promised by his former productions

DUTCH ROOM.

"The New Bullad." T. S Cooper. A pleasing picture of a gal with con

"Musidora." By W. D. Kennedy Very pretty coloured

"Sketching from Nature; a Bud in the Foreground." T. Woodround. A picture of much merit.

"A Pastoral Scene." By J. Wilson, jun. Entitled to be specified with honour.

"St. Valentine's Morning." W. Kidd. A good picture; the subject well treated.

DRAWINGS AND MINIATURES

Our limits present our going into any length in the specification of this part of the exhibition; we will content ourselves, therefore, by pointing out what struck us as being most deserving attention and praise

Miss M. Gillies has four pictures, all eminently beautiful. Nos. 680—817—852—857

Mr. Carrick has eight miniatures, painted in his very favourable and masterly style. They are Nos. 693—705—747—751—785—791—811—and 858

Mr. Thorburn has eight: Nos. 667—673—675—725—729—801—and 836. All these miniatures are remarkable for that broad and vigorous manner which the artist has imparted into minuature painting, and when gives he power of oil painting. These pictures are entitled to high praise

Sir W. Newton has eight pictures: Nos. 685—700—735—751—771—791—818—880. They all exhibit a exquisite delicacy of touch and delightful finish. Five of them is a picture of the immense piece of ivory of the royal miniaturist, a specimen of his species of art.

Sir W. Ross has also eight pictures. Nos. 72—[illegible]—807—811—826 All painted in his usual admirable manner, full of brilliancy, knowing a perfect knee edge of his art.

There are, besides these, some very charming miniatures and drawings; but to give anything like a detailed notice of them would be most difficult. At present the rooms, as we be s already said, are too crowded for a mint of that close examination which portraits of this class necessarily require to form a proper estimate of their merits, and to come to a decision which would be either unjust or the reverse. But what we have said must, therefore, suffice, although we regret our present inefficiency.

Of Architectural Drawings, there are some very good designs and elevations. Amongst the contributors to this part of the collection are Papworth, Sokes, Hair, Meins, Burrel, Grenville, Lamb, P. Hardwick, R.A., Brown, Colson, H. Watt, E. Gerring, Jun., J. Wild, C. Barry, R.A., W. Railton, F. Pouget, W. Garrett, &c., &c., and many others of great merit.

SCULPTURE.

1295 A Bust, in Marble, of Prisoner Alarm, by J. Francis, is good. It represents the Prince much as he is, and neither vulgarizes nor idealizes his feature and expression.

1297. "Love Triumphant," a Group in Marble, by M. P. MacDowall, A. is very fine; it is full of classic feeling. The figures are beautiful in the outline; the limbs and draperies are graceful. This is a splendid specimen of the English school

1298 & 1299, by E. H. Baily, R.A., have all the merits which this sculptor has usually imparted to his works. He has also 1274—1282—and 1304, a l merito rious productions, and quite sufficient to keep up his reputation

Mr. J. G. Lough has 1270, a Group in Marble of "Hebe Banished," very fine; and 1277, a Figure, in marble of "Lear, from Shakspeare," finely imagined and executed: there is a true feeling for high art in the production of this gentleman

Mr. Behnes has a Group in Marble, "Lady Godiva," of extraordinary beauty, and several Busts in his inimitable style; one of them, a Bust of Sir Frederick Pollock is perhaps the finest Bust ever produced in the studio or an English artist

Mr. Gibson, R.A., has, in a Group in Marble; [illegible]

Mr. Park has a [illegible] bust, and so are Mr Sievey, Mr. Joseph, Mr. Weekes, and many other sculptors with whose names the public are familiar. The collection is a good one; but it is to be regretted that the sculptures are placed in so bad and inconvenient a place, that it is a matter of difficulty to see what they are, much more to decide upon their comparative claims to distinction.

THE MAGAZINES FOR MAY.

Last week, by an unusual press of intelligence, we were prevented paying a due notice to the monthly periodicals, which, however, cannot be passed over with less than welcome, therefore, our present task

AINSWORTH'S MAGAZINE presents the usual course of the editor's "Saint James," with the continuation of "Lives of Twenty-five Years," and "Jack Sheppard," by W. F. Ainsworth; and "The Elliston Papers"—three of the most dissimilar stories of the miscellany. This number contains more reviews than usual, and in one of them the genius, very appropriately, bids adieu upon a pedestal, to the late editor of Leigh Hunt's Poems, in consequence of certain amendations in the impression just published. The poetical contributions are better than usual, and in one of them, "Ode to Queen Victoria," by Henry Bettenham, Esq., Herald Painter of the Royal Academy, are well-inter ti ed: "The Song of Water," by Charles Mackay, is a composition of very superior merit, for which we were glad to have room.

FRASER'S MAGAZINE opens with a paper "On Railways," in which the different schemes of Railway reform and legislation are investigated, and the conclusion arrived at, somewhat opposite to Lord Ashley's Travels, and Charles Sheridan's style of a very amusing paper in Thurnam's raciest manner, detailing a journey from Redmond to Brussels. The hint to carry a case of the best Havannahs to give to the snobs custom-house officers, is a very excellent one, which deserves a very large proportion for the tourist to spare himself much annoyance. "A Letter from Redmond Hill, that broke up down with its splendour" is a brilliant piece of humour, and "Sketches of Character" are full of subtleties; and the remarks of the women less of Antwerp and Brussels; are in T. Hamilt's best vein. "Marshal Soult" is a very spirited sketch of the veteran warrior and statesman—the Caesius of the Table," is very severe and sketchy, and "Recipes for Cookery, and its professors," "An Episode of the Times of Philip Sidney," "A pretty novelette," and "The Luck of Barry Lyndon" is most finished and intelligent "The Fancy Ball."

TAIT'S MAGAZINE is well stored with reviews of new books, among which the soundest is a paper on "Laing's Translation of the Heimskringla; or, Chronicle of the Kings of Norway;" it is, however, hardly justly proposed. The review of Gurney's "Letters from Antwerp to Paris" is most entertaining. "The Spirit of Ariel" plays in a very rosy paper on the Greek comedies; "Edmund Burke" is a very good "Lecture" in the style of Shakespeare, Keppel, Burns, Hobbes, and the majority of Swift." The political strokes are the "Scottish Church," "Common Law and Special Juries," and "English Factories and Irish Franchise;" and of the contributed novels Mrs. Gore's "Banks and Prizes"

THE DUBLIN UNIVERSITY MAGAZINE is somewhat below its usual vevoir "The Crisis of Ireland," the opening paper, is a sound democratic digest, with a fine admixture of political spirit. "The Origin of the Humming bird," in a few smart strokes, of course paints these exquisite little creatures to the lustres of the Emerald Isle. A paper on Edmund Spenser is a curious compound of pathos, precept, and affectation, and would not be read. "The Fight of Ulysses with the Bow," "Sketches of Character," "Useful Knowledge," and "Information for the Million," are most interesting papers, and the political papers displaying the insipid commerce of modern literature. "Barrow's Life of Peter the Great" is a most entertaining biography of the great admiral of England. "Sunrise from the Rialto" is a charming record of people and places, "Light and Right" keep-moving sport. The Irish paper, somewhat too diffuse, is on the Church Education Society and the National Board"

THE LIBRARY OF TRAVEL, edited by Walter R. Kelly, is a new enterprise, modestly announced as "A Popular Observation of Travels." The first volume, before us, comprises 108 8vo pages, and sets forth one illustrations of countries, both and the Holy Land. The work appears to be laboriously, yet popularly compiled; and the contributors are recruits from the ranks of Bellenden, Kerr, Lane, Urquhart, Skinner, Kinnear, Ainsworth, &c., and promises to be, from this specimen, the "Library" promises to be as useful, as it is entertaining We could, however, suggest some improvement in the wood cuts, the specimens of which are well chosen, but clumsily engraved. The letter press is far the better embellishment

THE BANKERS' MAGAZINE, No. II. contains several papers of interest in connexion with the Government views of the Bank question, amongst which another portion of our space, one bank of issue, free trade in bank, and Mr. Gilbart's financial essays are the best. A diary of various kinds in on Banking affairs and be more useful.

SIMMONDS'S COLONIAL MAGAZINE, starting with a paper of some familiar, defending the Anglo-Saxon race from the charges of "Buffalonism," and indeed in the writer's knowledge of every journal published in India, from Ceylon to Delhi, he hints, by the way, that, as regards their affluence to personal fashes and resentments, to private quarrels, they are not more numerous than are necessary to the joint in on of the mother-country; and this for the very good reason, that as in India there is no room for slander in the reader, it is never in fashion to the editor. The article on Jamaica, and the Governor General of India, Lord Ellenborough. The agriculture of Jamaica and Honduras, a answer to New Zealand (with an original map), the trade of Java, and a visit to Van Diemen's Land, form the contents of a number of papers unusual in this very interesting representative of the mammy ate of our colonial economy.

MAXWELL'S HISTORY OF THE IRISH REBELLION IN 1798, Part V., concludes the details of the hard-contested fight at Arklow, and then proceeds to Fawkes's Mill, and the capture of Vinegar-hill; the occupation of Wexford by the rebels, with anecdotes of their atrocities there. One of Cruikshank's illustration—the Massacre at Scullabogue—is most terrifically detailed.

THE FARMERS MAGAZINE is published with the sanction of His Grace the Duke of Bedford, with a memoir by Mr Cuthbert W. Johnson, [illegible] papers on manures and drainage, and reports of the Royal Agricultural Society of England, and of influential farmers' clubs meetings, are among the most prominent articles in this vigilant journal of the agricultural interest

BENTLEY'S MISCELLANY, with "The Fortunes of the Scattergood Family" [illegible]-catcher, is a number of very moderate pretensions. In the Butterflies papers are some admirably descriptive [illegible], as the following of Tower-hill.

"There are few places in England which preserve so perfectly the aspect of an old continental town as Tower hill and its surrounding buildings, when viewed through the medium of moonlight, softly mellowed tempered to wrap us more prominent objects in semi-obscurity, whilst, at the same time, it permits the general outline of the fortifications to be visible. The irregular buildings of the fortress itself, with lights gleaming from small windows high in the air, and dim oil lamps flickering at wide intervals on different portions of the outworks—the open expanse of the hill, with its borders of trees before the houses, forming a rude species of boulevard, assist in completing the picture. Every now and then the roll of a drum from the interior echoed along the ramparts, followed by the challenge of a sentinel; and occasionally indistinct sounds of music and revelry broke from some of the taverns, where a few mariners had assembled from their vessels to spend their pay, and get rid of their hard-earned payments as speedily as might be. But beyond this, there was little noise for Tower Hill is not a great thoroughfare and towards evening is comparatively deserted, except by those whose interests lie within its precincts.

The rumawee, Freddy Scattergood, in the forest, in another incident pantomimely traveled here in a grimace of a fine sprightly.

"It was a fine bright afternoon—warm, too, for the time of year People had left their great-coats at home for the first time, and walked about with cheerful faces. Everywhere looking for the early crocuses of the flowers peeped out from amongst the more sober articles. The snowdrops from the dull, wintry ground. Weathercocks gleamed in the sunlight against the blue sky; long tracks of fragrant heath and turnip dainty, redolent of country odours, appeared to supplant the sickly haunts on the window-sills. Travellers forsook the interiors of omnibuses, and climbed the roof, to the great joy of the [illegible] who prided in their fine fares. Frugal housekeepers began to think of having their fires out in the middle of the day, and dreamt of [illegible] willow sheaves and elaborate dissections of many yoked silver paper. Everybody looked forward for the spring, and perhaps everything would not very delusive, even the next morning, as pleasant anticipations usually do."

An [illegible] and an Italian tale; two institutions of Ingoldsby; and the Physiology of London Life; are the other principal papers the later, exceeding to some twenty pages, is heavier than usual, the chapter on "Town Life" being as dreamy as the [illegible] of London. Lastly, it is preceded by "The Divan," in which are some laughable attempts at dreollery, of the best, in every case, successful. Such somewhere says—"I like the [illegible] and make a little" on words [illegible] and the reader may, in like manner, suspect our appreciation of "The Divan," in which thus is accorded to our journal a slight merit:—

"The ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, with its usual active vigilance, was the first to announce the approaching furore, by giving the music of the dance, and illustrations of its execution, in which a lady with long plaited tails and a gentleman in embellishment costume, were throwing their limbs about to a renowned set, to the advertisement of tuition in its mysteries crept into the newspapers. How we should like to have seen the interview and what a subject it would have made for the pencil of Mr. Leech, who, in the portrays of "foreign gentlemen, seedy [illegible] ans, stands unrivalled. Bohemia must indeed be the land of dance, from the days of La Esmeralda to the present time, when its very nobles give lessons therein. "The Dado." a Recreation in Natural History is a very smart trifle.

BLACKWOOD has a sound, if not distinguished or attractive number, opening with a paper on the "Increase of Crime," which contains many startling facts, setting it with a most extraordinary and alarming causes of anxiety the constant and unvarying and increase of crime! though in the same page introducing Lola as a political cause. This is succeeded by a slight paper entitled "Rome and Her Leaders" and an odd affair—"The Monster Misers of Literature," which the reader of Bentley's Miscellany and Circulating Library—"Dean Aikers—Gresham," is one of those masterly digests of passing events which are rarely to be met with, but in Blackwood's pages, and make his thick volumes treasurable. "The Three Black Lords of Dunbarton" is the first of Frank Hill, and with "Love in a Wilderness," another novelette, conclude the main prose papers. Some stanzas on Snow, by Delta, remind us of the graceful spirit of his earlier poems.

PEOPLE'S AND MONTHLY MAGAZINE labours to support its claim as title of "Humorist" by a paper entitled "The Ill Humorists." Our Readers in" It is, however, followed by Mrs [illegible] in a lively satire, "The Roberts on their Travels," and "Parish Parties" is of the same sly school. The Reminiscence of a Medical Student is a very interesting sketch, "Marianne Easterling." Peter Parley's has a capital story; Mrs. Gore, a Love Story; Horace Smith, a bland [illegible] and there is even a Mr. Peele, a very humorous version of "The Beauty of Brighton;" A Song, "Mrs. Hope, the Fortune Teller," by Mr. James Kenney, is entitled to the company in which we find it. Perhaps, the most entertaining paper in the number is the analysis of the life of Brummell just published. Altogether, we are bound to congratulate the Metropolitan on its [illegible].

MUSIC.

THE MUSICAL SEASON.

"A galaxy of charms."

Once more are we in the vortex of the thousand-and-one May and June concerts, operas, soirées musicales, re-unions, &c; each and every one of which we are bound to notice in their turn, (enough to turn the brains of as many chroniclers) with this solace, however, constantly before us, that, wishing to be impartial to all, we are never unjust to a few, and so may be said to escape pretty harmless from the crowd of conflicting opinions. For the same time, it must not be supposed that we praise everything alike, be its pretension what it may: no, no "Palmam qui meruit, ferat," is our motto, and we will rigidly adhere to it.

Independent of the native and constantly resident talent which is to be found in the metropolis, this season of the year is favourable to the migratory movements of certain spirits of song, who think about this time they "can use their wings unclogged with fog or mist," and therefore journey to the south with a praiseworthy object of seeing Dan Phœbus in England. The consequence is, that at this season every year, there is to be found more vocal and instrumental talent belonging to the sweet art of Music in London, than in any other locale of the same extent. Some soils are often more favourable to our indigenous offspring, than to their exotic foster-children; this unfortunately has, or had been the case for a long time; but luckily the feeling of the nation at large, combined with the recovery of Braham's former "majesty of the people," given fair opportunity to many of our compatriots of competing with the proudest vocalists of the day, and exclusive of "the Star" is it not delightful to hear and see Mrs. Alfred Shaw, Miss Rainforth, Madame Albertazzi, Miss Dolby, Mdme. Taillon, &c., placed upon a footing with the greatest foreign vocalists, and fairly dividing the applause with them? Nothing can be more gratifying to every true lover of art, such as Salvi, Duprez, Standigl, and others, who wish to cultivate an acquaintance with the standard English music, more than to ignorantly affect to contemn it. It harmonises or tones down the musical features of a concert wherever they chance to meet, and is productive of that "glee and good humour" which should be the motto of all sons and daughters of Apollo, whether they come from the Hebrides' fixed rocks, or the floating island of Delos. We shall therefore ever welcome, and treat like a friend, impartially, according to their respective merits. After this general announcement we shall proceed to detail.

HANOVER-SQUARE ROOMS.

The third concert, for the season, of the Society's Armonicon took place at these rooms, on Monday evening last, and was full and fashionably attended. The instrumental performances were Mozart's Symphony in E flat, Onslow's brilliant overture to "Anacreon," Weber's mysterious but beautiful one to "The Roller of the Spirits," and Romberg's in D; the whole of which, with an efficient band, did not fail to go well, under the leadership of Mr. Loder. Herr Ernst, the celebrated violinist, on this occasion disappointed from the German severe tenth of his usual style, and wantoned with perfect ease in all the gay luxuriance of the Italian school—perhaps, indeed, with too much levity, for, in some of his variations on "The Carnival de Venise" he was doubtful whether he was introducing the Faranini manner or not so outré, nay ridiculous, were they. They were performed, however, with the ease of a magic musician, who commanded his bow as a wand. The vocal music did not go well, although Miss Rainforth and Salvi sang charmingly. We suspect that this was in a great measure owing to the production of a certain Signor Peregetti (of the Velut species) who created a mixed sensation of disgust and merriment throughout the room. In the first act he sang a poor composition of his own, and in the second, the celebrated scena from "Tancredi," commencing with "Tu che accendi." He is a singer of no ordinary merit, and might obtain a distinguished place in the Pope's Chapel, but there is an evident and proper feeling of dislike shown in England to such exhibitions, when the real sense of the people is taken. Mr. Forbes conducted with his usual skill, except at one passage, where either he or the singers were at fault, but they soon rallied, and all went on well again to the conclusion. These concerts contribute much to the advancement of music amongst us.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

MAY GAMES.

The nightingale, if she should sing by day,
When every goose is cackling, would be thought
No better a musician than the wren:
How many things by season 'season'd are
To their right praise and true perfection.—SHAKESPEARE.

There use to be a buffo singer at Vauxhall who moved the leges to desperate laughter, when, in the character of an adventurous Cockney, he recited the perils of "A Voyage to Putney by Water." Yet, after all, there are more agreeable things in the world than passing Battersea Reach at Christmas, with the watery wind howling in your ears, and dashing the snow and sleet against your "genial cheeks." On a summer's afternoon, indeed, with the prospect of ducks and green peas at Ava's, is another affair. Albeit, we have not reached the gorgeous season—

"The azure time of June,
When the skies are deep in the stainless noon."

We are on its threshold, and hold it convenient to speculate for the gamesome month in May. Anon we shall have Epsom Races August carnival of Cockaigne! appropriate as reasonable, when nature is verdant and man is green! For the nonce we are without Olympics—at least any of account. The second Spring Meeting at Newmarket, which was celebrated in the present week, was beyond precedent devoid of interest. The Derby Idle Pate, the only incident from which any prospective matter is looked for, is, as it were, won by one of the best three-year-olds out, or thereabouts, but one, unfortunate, of the fieldmen, not in the Derby. Welbeck, who also won the Newmarket Stakes very easily, is one of those examples so common on the turf, of the uncertainties in all speculations. Here is a mere bought for £200, that in a few hours after passing into the prize paid for him, with a han some premium, who owner has pocketed upwards as many thousands as he gave hundreds, without six pence of return. Taking of the uncertainty of the turf, and a couple of its circumstances in the Racing Wagers (or whatever its name is, Bill!) Conceive a being in committee ever since the opening of the present session of Parliament, and still undisposed of!

I fear that the P. P. predicament not absolutely dissimilar to that the wags call it the pauto post-futuro ball? We wish, apropos of the course, that we could see a few more of the Members of Parliament assembled on the Derby day, than we are likely to be honoured by the presence of Her Majesty and her Court—for more the pity. Too great a gulf is already fixed between princes and their people: to say the least, it is very questionable policy to widen it.

But to our May games and forthcoming out-door sports. Already the Royal Thames Yacht Club is "on the sea," or, more properly to speak, on the intermediate, making the pageantry on the queen of rivers between Greenwich and Cool House pink. Friday was the first of its season, a goodly beginning, whose results, however, cannot be known till after our journals has gone to press. The new day division is "up and at it," from Westminster-bridge to the junction of Thame sat less, and every where else. The great Oars Regatta of the metropo is will be one of the most splendid fresh-water contests known to modern times. The prizes amount to a dozen and three. Lord Cardigan is for president, and the Lord Mayor is assisting in the task of all classes. Cricket is at an immense premium; the list of new members elected at the last meeting of the Marylebone Club is stupendous; not a questionable name to be found among the lot of forty-no. There is a Smith, under!, but then it is Montague Smith; Montague Smith, Esquire! and who could say it is an unfit associate for the Lascelles, Bennetts, Villiers, Neville Vansittarts, Cumberlyes, D'Eyncourts, &c., &c.? The progress of hanging it seems has had a great reward—in some places the "salmon running on the flies, and single sizes, but in battalions." It is stated on authority high in the waters of Mayfair, to number of scaly fauna in Stationers' time) the trouts appear as if taken with a mania for suicide. A couple of gentlemen were upturned in a river, the name of which is spelt with six consonants, and therefore the reader is spared the trial of decipherment, some eighteen dozen of trouts did fish who immolated themselves upon a contrivance called a "cock-bird." Peculiar to English eyes is not precisely, but probably means the Welch a much gayer character. In confirmation of this we quote extracts of announcements, is the state-ment given in the Count Journal, that the Royal Buck-hounds are to be put out of commission. If it be true (as seems to be) that Her cost the country £10,000 a year, they certainly are a set of uncommonly expensive dogs, and nobody can pay them. But £10,000 a year—dear Court Journal is there not some slight error in "the tottle?"

"Now, in the dawn of all the year,
Upon what meat do these our buck hounds feed?"

If the housekeeping of the royal hounds be upon the scale that the expenditure would imply, let the hounds at Acorn Heath be handed over to the Poor-law Commissioners, as a place of reward for one of our fellow-creatures who pursues themselves of the crime of poverty by a seven-years-course of ja- gaolee. Tais may be a sad reverse, but remember to what base uses we all may come.

"Imperious Cæsar, dead, and turned to clay,
May stop a hole, and keep the wind away!"

HAMLET.

MONDAY.—The badness of the Derby day at the Suffo k Stakes, made betting round out of the question. The cure and Minotaur being so well "in," that to back the field seemed little short of insanity, a more judicious regulation of the weights would have enabled more than a couple of horses to start with any chance of a successful, and had not Lottie so absolutely lame, out of it a great cure

THE DERBY.—Nothing was backed with any spirit but The Ugly Buck, whose good or good-for-nothing—will assuredly see 7 to 1—perhaps less—and plent more to carry his present money. We recommend them to hedge while they may. Running thus:—Ugly Buck, Running Rein, Mount Charles, and Pa'ad Sigure. A ridiculous report that Campaneer had been beaten "out of all property" in a trial with Akbar and Khorassan has the effect of drawing the former back to 40 to 1.

SUNDAY (!).—This afternoon he came again into favour, and left off at 25 to 1, taken Akbar nominally at the same figure. No change in the Oaks, except that Crenoline was backed, from the start to an about £2400, at 12 to 1.

THURSDAY.—Having nothing to extract them after the Suffolk Stakes, the majority of the visitors at the Second Spring Meeting turned their backs on the race at the close of the second day's racing, and put in an appearance this afternoon at the country, and to some purpose, as their sayings and doings, small as they were, served to re-establish the Ugly Buck in the premiership, and to show that Rattan's friends were uncommonly lucrative; we presume he will "come with a rush" as soon as the Stockbridge party have had their fling. In the meantime lay the field against the favourite, we may add, however, that Colonel Peel's lot we also have backed at 16 to 1 if layers would have been found, and that Sir Gilbert Heathcote's two, and the King of the Gipsies, were at no alarming amount on Monday's betting. DISPOSAL OF HER MAJESTY'S BUCK HOUNDS. It appears that the disposal of the pack is to be included in the list of Royal retrenchments, now being carried out to so great an extent. The reason for this course being adopted is, it is said, the expensive exception attached to the establishment for their keeping, and which is altogether considered useless, as the pack has not been used for the purposes of hunting by any of the members of the Royal Family for some years past. Her Royal Highness Prince Albert appears to prefer the quiet and less dangerous amusement of hare hunting. The expense of the establishment exceeds annum by £11,000; 2,000 of which is paid to the master.

AQUATICS. The Lord Mayor will attend the ensuing Thames Regatta, accompanied by all the insignia of civic splendour, and will appear in the grand city barge. FORNASARI'S BENEFIT—SCENE FROM THE OPERA OF "ZAMPA," AT HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

FORNASARI.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

The return of Cerito to this house on Saturday last, was a cause of delight to all frequenters of the Opera: she is, as ever, "redolent of spring," and graceful as

> Curling mists that rise
> To kiss the stars in twilit skies!

Cerito is certainly improved in elegance, as well as dexterity—some of her performances during her "aerial flights" are truly astonishing, and exhibit the "poetry of motion" in new and most captivating rhythms—if we may apply the word to the music of her gesticulations. Mario, in "La Sonnambula," sang most exquisitely. On Tuesday, Donizetti's "L'Elisir d'Amore" was produced, and gave Corelli an opportunity of vindicating his claims to public notice and applause. He sang most excellently well—not, perhaps, obliterating from our memory poor Catone, but still in a style which deserves to be highly commended.

On Thursday Herold's opera of "Zampa" was re-produced for the benefit of Sigr. Fornasari, who on the occasion personated the hero. This opera has been universally called the chef d'œuvre of the composer, but we cannot find out the truth of the opinion. He has written many other things far superior in our judgment. When composers are either above or below their styles they never produce anything startingly good; and Herold's genius was not vast or wonderful, although delightfully pleasing: in fact, he was in music what our Shenstone was in poetry. He had not the Weberian strength to grasp with the subject of "Zampa": still there are some beautiful things in it, and they never appeared to more advantage than on the occasion we record. Fornasari was magnificent as Zampa, and gave a reading of the Pirate, which would have delighted even Byron himself, from whom the subject has been stolen. The opera of "Zampa" may be fairly said to be resuscitated. Fornasari is a great actor as well as singer. The house was not as full as we should have wished to see it: but this is owing, perhaps, to the public's being acquainted now-a-days that an announced benefit is for the manager's profit, and not for the affiché bénéficiaire.

AUBER.

AUBER.—"THE CROWN DIAMONDS."

Denis Esprit Ferdinand Auber was born in Paris in 1785, and was brought up in commercial, not musical, pursuits. His propensity, however, was for the latter: and with a modesty almost always accompanying genius, he published his first productions under the name of Lamarre. After two years' residence in London he returned to Paris, and produced an opera comique, entitled "La Bergere Châtelaine." Subsequently he brought forth two others, "Le Sejour Militaire" and "Testament et Billet-doux." After a variety of vicissitudes, which but ill-accorded with the views of a mind like Auber's, he placed himself under the tuteiage of Cherubini, and soon produced at the Opera Comique "Emma," which met with immense success. This was followed by several other operas at the same house, which ultimately opened the doors of the Royal Academy to him, where he produced his "Muette," the fame of which has not only influenced the musical taste but the politics of Europe. To enumerate his subsequent successes would exceed our limits considerably: suffice it to say, that no composer has written more or more varied beauty than Auber. His vocal writing is exquisitely wrought and his orchestral the very perfection of instrumentalism. His modesty prevents him from producing what his genius would suggest, and carry him through if he would but essay, or we should have symphonies and quartetts rivalling those of Haydn, Mozart, or Beethoven. The operas of "Masaniello," "Fra Diavolo," "Gustave," and a host of others, have conferred immortality upon the genius that invented them.

SCENE FROM THE OPERA OF 'THE CROWN DIAMONDS," AT THE PRINCESS' THEATRE.

His last opera with which we have been made acquainted, namely, "The Crown Diamonds," does not sparkle with the jewels that are to be found in "Masaniello," or "Gustave," but still it abounds with beauties, which, if not lustrous, are at least solid. He, no doubt, wrote his "partition" for voices of a peculiar range, and if a composer ever feels delight in putting the powers of a vocalist to the test, Auber must have been pleased in running to the extreme, the facilities of Madame Thillon's vocal powers. Next week we shall give a fine portrait of this most accomplished vocalist and actress.

WILLIS'S ROOMS.

Miss Steele, once the pupil of the establishment in which she is now a distinguished professor of singing, gave her annual concert on Monday evening last, at these rooms, which were attended by a host of friends to the fair bénéficiaire, more on account of the respect and esteem she herself is held in, than attracted by the somewhat too lengthy bill of fare she had provided for their entertainment. The chief novelty of the evening was Mdme Dorus Gras, who made her first appearance this season, and who, notwithstanding the fatigue consequent upon a long journey, sang as freshly and flexibly as ever. A deprecatory address was made for her by Sir H. R. Bishop (who conducted the concert), but there was no necessity for it. The fair bénéficiaire herself sang some things very charmingly; other vocalists acquitted themselves in many morceaux—too many to be all enumerated, and "glorious John" delighted the audience with his "Norma" and other drolleries.

MALAHIDE CASTLE.

Few places in Ireland are more identified with its history than Malahide Castle. One of the earliest built, it is one of the longest preserved while its unfailing line of noble lords for 650 years stands distinguished in the annals of the country for excellences of the highest order. Before the Norman invasion, there were no strongholds in Ireland; but Henry II. seeing that he could not retain the fruits of his invasion without garrisoning the country, bestowed grants of land on his several followers, on the condition that they should entitle themselves to a tenure each by the erection of a fortress. Richard Talbot, son of the Lord Rockeswell, in Herefordshire, who accompanied Henry on the Irish expedition, was presented with the lands of Malahide, and other estates in its neighbourhood; agreeable to the terms of seisin he built a strong crenelated castle on a limestone rock, commanding the beautiful little bay. Ever since, that castle and the baronial estates have been held in possession by the same family, through an unbroken succession of male heirs, for a period of nearly seven centuries.

The seignorial estate of Malahide is the only one in Ireland, which can be traced as having been held directly and immediately under the Crown, while all the others were held of subjects by rent, suit, and service. The lords of Malahide, pursuant to charter, and the right of tenure, never acknowledged a superior but the King of England, nor rendered homage to any but the Crown. The Talbots de Malahide spring from a common stock with the Talbots of Shrewsbury.

Richard Hogan Talbot, the common ancestor of both great families, is mentioned in "Domesday Book" as being possessed of several "hides" of land. The Talbots de Malahide were ever special favourites of English sovereigns; and from John to Edward IV. we find each emulative of his predecessor in adding to the privileges of the Barons of Malahide. Among other privileges, Edward IV. exempted the family from homage for fifty years, and granted them a license to leave Ireland for three years at a time, created them absolute masters of their own port, and allowed them to appropriate the customs of merchandise. Sir Thomas Talbot, who, in 1620, succeeded to the estates, was grandfather to William Talbot who first acquired the estate of "Carta," in county Kildare, and was created a baronet in 1622; he was great grandfather to Colonel Richard, who, in 1685, was created Earl of Tyrconnell by James II., and died chief governor of Ireland. The Duchess of Tyrconnell was sister to the Duchess of Marlborough, and the most distinguished belle in the court of Charles II.

Lord Talbot's untiring acquaintance with the real state of Ireland, and his thorough knowledge of the true character of his countrymen, render him a valuable adviser and assistant to whatever Lord-Lieutenant may be sent to govern Ireland. He has long withdrawn himself from active political life, and now devotes himself chiefly to those refined studies which tend to elevate and ennoble the human mind. His social circle always comprises persons distinguished for ability and worth; and wherever genius may be found, whether it lurks beneath the plaidan jacket of the mechanic or the threadbare coat of the poor scholar, or ornaments a coronet, it is sure to find a fostering hand and a ready welcome from the Lord of Malahide. Lady Talbot, who is to Dublin society what one of the Lady Patronesses is to Almack's, is an amiable, kind-hearted gentlewoman, who is highly esteemed by the nobility and idolized by the poor. Her bounteous charities are dispensed without any regard to sect or party—an example which, if more generally adopted by the Irish nobility, would do much to ameliorate the condition of what is not inaptly termed poor Ireland.

The castle occupies a commanding site, and is a large, crenelated, embattled building, unequal in height and irregular in form. The ravages which Cromwell had done its towers have been repaired, while other improvements and restorations preserve it as a specimen of feudal architecture, and a home for modern magnificence. A circular tower rises on either side of the entrance, which is by an arched door that opens into a hall, from which a winding staircase, of antique fashion, conducts you to a spacious and most curious apartment, called the "Oak Chamber." This is a long, narrow room, lighted by one window, and that of stained glass; it is wainscoted and raised with carved oak, black and shining with age. The panelling is carved with devices illustrative of Scripture, and a beautifully carved figure of the Virgin Mary surmounts the mantel piece.

The baronial, or great dining hall, is on the right of the oak room. The room is lofty and vaulted, after the manner of cathedrals, with richly-carved oak. At its south end there is a gallery. It has two large open hearths, and is lighted by three Gothic windows. There is a splendid portrait of Mary Queen of Scots, by Hoobein, as also portraits of Tyrconnell, his duchess, and his chancellor. Off this room is the library, in which is an iron chest, containing the family records. The drawing-room is on the left, very tastefully modernised, and were it not for admonitions from the casements, one would soon forget they were in a building of antiquity. This room is furnished with some good paintings, by Hals, Hobbima and Cuint, among which the most striking is "The Temptations of Anthony." There is also a portrait of Mary of Scotland, which was brought to England by James I., given by Charles II. to the Duchess of Portsmouth, who, on her return to France, presented it to the niece of Tyrconnell; there is also an altar piece, by Albert Durer, which was originally placed in the oratory of Holyrood house, while occupied by Mary.

Our limits prevent us giving a more detailed account of this interesting place, which we had prepared for publication.

MALAHIDE CASTLE—THE GREAT DINING-HALL.

HISTORY OF WOOD-ENGRAVING.

Nicholas Le Sueur, a French wood-engraver, who was born in 1691, and died in 1764, excelled in the execution of chiaro-scuro engravings. His works in this style are decidedly the best that appeared in the eighteenth century. His small wood-cuts are generally engraved in a dry spiritless manner; they display neither freedom nor delicacy of execution, and are totally devoid of what is termed "effect." P. S. Fournier, the younger, a celebrated letter-founder, born at Paris, 1712, died 1768, also occasionally engraved on wood. He, however, chiefly merits a passing notice here in consequence of three tracts which he published, between 1758 and 1761, relating to the origin and progress of wood-engraving, and the invention of typography. About that period considerable curiosity appears to have been excited in France and Germany with respect to the origin and early history of wood-engraving, in consequence of the researches of Schœpflin, Meerman, and others, respecting the invention of printing. In Germany, at this period, there does not appear to have been a single wood-engraver of the slightest pretensions to talent. Schœpflin, in his "Vindiciæ Typographicæ," having made an assertion on a question of wood-engraving, as being admitted "by all experienced persons," Fournier remarks, that "so far from there being many experienced wood-engravers to choose from, M. Schœpflin would be the most likely to experience some difficulty in finding one to consult." For the purpose of showing that at this period wood-engraving was not in a better condition in Italy than in Germany we merely remark that the wood-cut ornaments in the copies of the Pope's Bulls and Decretals printed at Rome between 1760 and 1770, are not superior to the cuts which are to be found in cheap editions of the "Pilgrim's Progress" of the same date, notwithstanding that the engraver—Lucchesini—has put his name to them as if he had performed a work from which he deserved to be held in honourable memory. The cuts in a Spanish book entitled "Letania Lauretana de la Virgen Santissima," translated from the Latin, and printed at Valencia in 1763, are by the same engraver; considerable fancy is displayed in the designs, and though the execution be paltry, yet the book, as Tom Hearne says, "is a curiosity," and possibly might justify the Rev. Waldo Sibthorp in his denunciation of what, since his re-conversion, he calls "Mariolatry."

INFANT HERCULES—FROM THE PICTURE BY SIR JOSHUA REYNOLDS.

Though wood-engraving was in a very languishing state when Thomas Bewick first began to practise the art, it yet was not wholly extinct, as some persons have imagined who have ascribed to him the credit of re-inventing it. Such an assertion, indeed, could only have been made by persons who had no knowledge of the state of the art, either in England or on the Continent, in the time of Bewick's boyhood: they might have been well-informed in other respects; but most certainly they had never read Papillon's work, which contains a minute account of the practice of the art, nor had ever seen the "Oxford Almanack," a highly-seasoned little volume of wit, which first appeared in 1764, when Bewick was about eleven years old, and which contains several cuts, probably engraved by a person of the name of Lister. About 1763, a person of the name of Watts engraved some large cuts, after drawings by Luca Cambiaso, besides several others of small size; and there are four cuts, "engraved by T. Hodgson," in Sir John Hawkins's "History of Music," which was published in 1776, the year in which Bewick first visited London. At this time he certainly was not the sole professor of the art in England, and neither did the wood-engravers whom he found established in business in London, and amongst whom he found employment, acquire their practical knowledge of their art from him. Though it may be unquestionable that Bewick was self taught, it by no means follows that the art of wood-engraving was lost in England when he first entered on his course of self-instruction. There can, however, be no doubt that the genius and talents of Bewick chiefly contributed, not only to recal attention to the art of wood-engraving, but also to elevate its character and promote its extension, both in England and in other countries.

Thomas Bewick was born on the 10th August, 1753, at Cherry-burn, in the county of Northumberland, but on the south side of the Tyne, about twelve miles westward of Newcastle. A view of the cottage in which he was born is introduced in the cut of "The Blackbird," in his "History of British Birds." His father rented a small land-sale colliery at Mickley Bank, in the same neighbourhood, and Bewick, when a lad, was occasionally employed in the pit. He received his education at the school kept by the Rev. Christopher Gregson, at the Parsonage-house, at Ovingham, on the opposite side of the Tyne. It was in this pleasant neighbourhood that Bewick, when a lad, fishing for trout in the Tyne, and seeking for birds'-nests in the woods on its banks, first acquired that love of nature which, becoming enlarged and confirmed as he grew in years, is so strikingly displayed in his works. Though Bewick, as an artist, had no master, yet Nature was his mistress: he courted her on the hill-side and in the meadow, in the dene and in the loaning, by the stream and in the wood: he courted her as a country beauty, and as he found her so has he depicted her.

Bewick having shown a fondness and an aptitude for drawing when a lad, was placed by his father, in 1767, as an apprentice to Mr. Ralph Beilby, a copper-plate engraver, in Newcastle-on-Tyne. Though Mr. Beilby used to engrave copper-plates for books and bill-heads, when he had the chance of such work, yet the principal part of his business consisted in engraving crests and initials on articles of plate for silversmiths, and in cutting brass clock-faces and door-plates. Bewick, in the latter part of his life, told a friend of his that when an apprentice the cutting of clock-faces made his hands as hard as a blacksmith's, and almost disgusted him with engraving. Circumstances, however, occurred, which gave him an opportunity of trying his hand on a more yielding material—wood.

Dr. Charles Hutton, late Professor of Mathematics at Woolwich, then a schoolmaster at Newcastle, being about to publish his "Treatise on Mensuration," and wishing to have the diagrams engraved on wood, consulted Bewick's master on the subject. The result was, that he undertook to do them; but, as he knew nothing of engraving on wood, their execution was committed to Bewick, who invented a graver with a fine groove at the point, which enabled him to cut the outlines by a single operation. In one of the diagrams a view of the tower and steeple of St. Nicholas Church, Newcastle, is introduced. The publication of Dr. Hutton's "Mensuration," in numbers, commenced in 1768, and was finished in 1770. Bewick afterwards engraved bill-heads on wood; and it is likely that, while he remained with Mr. Beilby, he also engraved the cuts for a little book, entitled "Youth's Instructive and Entertaining Story Teller," printed by T. Saint, Newcastle, 177-.

Bewick's apprenticeship having expired in October, 1774, he returned to his father's house at Cherryburn, where, though he continued to do work as a general engraver for Mr. Beilby, he applied himself chiefly to wood-engraving. While living with his father, it is probable that he engraved the cut of the "Huntsman and the Old Hound," for which a premium was awarded to him by the Society for the Encouragement of Arts and Manufactures." This cut was first printed in an edition of Gay's "Fables," with illustrations by Bewick, published by T. Saint, 1779; and it is given in Charnley's edition of "Select Fables," with cuts by Thomas and John Bewick, 1820. In 1776, Bewick visited London. After working there for a few months, he returned to Newcastle, where he entered into partnership with his former master, Mr. Ralph Beilby. There seems reason to believe that Bewick was employed when in London by a person of the name of Hodgson—probably the engraver of the cuts in Sir John Hawkins's "History of Music"—who published about 1780 a little work entitled "A Curious Hieroglyphick Bible." It is at any rate certain that many of the cuts in this book were engraved by Bewick.

Bewick, who was decidedly a man of country habits and country taste, did not like London. Writing, in 1803, to one of his old schoolfellows, Mr. C. Gregson, the son of his old schoolmaster, who then kept an apothecary's shop in the neighbourhood of Blackfriars, he says: "I wonder how you can think of turmoiling yourself to the end of the chapter, and let the opportunity slip of contemplating at your ease the beauties of nature so bountifully spread out to enlighten, to captivate, and to cheer the heart of man. For my part I am still of the same mind I was in when in London, and that is, I would rather be herding sheep on Mickley Bank top than remain in London, although for so doing I was to be made Premier of England."

The cuts by Bewick, which appear in an edition of "Select Fables," published by T. Saint, Newcastle. 1784, are much superior to his former productions of the same kind, in drawing, execution, and general effect. From this time he seems to have become fully conscious of his powers, and to have determined to apply himself to the production of works of a higher character He accordingly began, in 1785, to draw and engrave the cuts of his "History of Quadrupeds," the first edition of which appeared in 1790—the descriptions having been written by his partner. In 1789, he drew and engraved his large cut of the Chillingham Bull, which is by far the best of his large cuts, but much inferior as a work of art to many of the cuts in his "British Birds." When only a few impress.ons of the Chillingham Bull had been taken off, more than six as is said, on thin parchment—the block warped and split. It was repaired by Bewick, but soon got as much out of order, that but few impressions were printed off. It was again repaired, but with better success, about 1819, though at the sacrifice of the ornamented border, with which the cut was originally surrounded. While the "Quadrupeds" were in progress, he also engraved, on copper, the plates in Cossett's "Tour in Sweden," 1793; in the Whitley Large Ox, 1789; and the remarkable Kyloe Ox, bred in Argyleshire, 1790. Those copper-plates might have been executed by an ordinary provincial engraver, but not those on wood by his partner.

The "History of Quadrupeds" having been favourably received by the public, and highly praised in the critical journals of the period, on account of the excellence of the cuts, which were decidedly superior to all wood-engravings of the same kind that had previously appeared, in any country, Bewick forthwith began to draw and engrave the cuts for the "History of British Birds," the first volume of which appeared in 1797, and the second in 1804. The descriptions in the first volume were mostly written by his partner, but the partnership having been dissolved shortly after its publication, the descriptions in the second were written by Bewick himself, but revised by the Rev. Henry Carey, Vicar of Felmington. The cuts contained in the volumes of the History, not only in the number of the engraved wood-engraver, but also to that of an artist of great genius. The skill with which he has availed himself of the means afforded by wood engraving to imitate the peculiar plumage of each bird, whether sleek or downy; the fidelity and spirit with which he has represented the birds themselves in their natural attitudes and with their characteristic look; and the judgment and feeling with which he has introduced the accessories of foliage and back-ground have not been surpassed by any subsequent wood-engraver, even with the aid of a professional draftsman to make the drawings for him. Bewick's birds have a "touch of Nature" which no mere manual dexterity in the use of tools can impart.

For their excellence as wood-engravings, looking merely at the manner of their execution, as well as for their truth-like character, with respect to the objects represented, in general form, detail, and expression, the following cuts in the "British Birds" are more especially deserving of notice:—the Yellow Bunting, the Lark, the Fieldfare, the Turkey, the Pintado, the Partridge, the Quail, the Bittern, the Woodcock, and the common Duck. Bewick himself considered the Yellow Bunting the best of all his cuts.

The admirable tail-pieces in the "British Birds,"—picturesque, moral, humorous, and entertaining—display in an eminent degree both Bewick's keenness in observing, and power in depicting Nature, such as he found her in his walks and perambulations; and may be considered as extending from Hexham to the sea, and from Cherryburn to the Scottish border. Those tail-pieces, indeed, may be considered as Graphic Notes made by Bewick when rambling about o'er hill and dale, by high-ways and bye-ways, for the purpose of observing the habits of birds, having a special eye at the same time to the manners and employments of men. Without intending to detract from Bewick's well-merited fame, we think it but just to mention here that several of those tail-pieces were drawn by a young man named Robert Johnson, who was an apprentice of Beilby and Bewick, as a copper-plate engraver, and who drew beautifully in water colours. Johnson, who died in 1796, aged twenty-five, drew the human figure more correctly than Bewick, and in the delineation of picturesque subjects was scarcely, if at all, inferior to him. A few of the tail-pieces in the second volume, chiefly of coast scenery, were drawn and engraved by Luke Clennell.

Bewick had an excellent knowledge both of the means and appliances of his art and of its just limits; and he never attempted, by mere delicacy of lines, to rival the productions of the copper-plate engraver. He always employed the simplest means to accomplish his object; and never mis-spent his time in the execution of cro-s-hatchings for the mere purpose of displaying his mechanical skill. Much fine work, with very little meaning, is not to be found in the cuts of Bewick's engravings; he employed his time and talents not in the cut, but in art, and the best of his works display more of thought and observat on than of hand-labour. The best of Bewick's cuts appeared in the first edition of his "British Birds;" for though many of them were retained in the subsequent editions, yet the best of them are not equal to the best of those which had previously appeared. In the later editions, the increase of numbers without increase of merit is strikingly apparent. When the second volume appeared, in 1804, Bewick had attained his fiftieth year; and, though he continued to draw and engrave for many years afterwards, he produced nothing to extend the fame which he had already merited. In 1818 he published a volume of Fables, with cuts from drawings by himself and Robert Johnson, and chiefly engraved by his pupils. Public expectation was disappointed in th s work: many of the subjects did not allow of the exercise of his peculiar genius, which was most powerfully displayed in homely scenes; and he always succeeded better in representing what he himself had seen and felt than in illus rating the fictions of others. He did not even engrave well from the drawing of another person when the subject was not such a one as he might have drawn himself.

Bewick was a man of strong and athletic frame, being nearly six feet high and proportion-bl stout. Though fond of country sports when a young man, he was extremely industrious, and most regular and methodical in his manner of living. He worked hard and long at his art, though not meanly; and acquired, by the exercise of his talents, a decent competence, as he had the prudence to retain the copyright of his principal works, the "Quadrupeds" and "British Birds." He died at his house on the Windmill-hills, Gateshead, on the 8th November, 1828, aged seventy-five, and was buried in the churchyard of Ovingham, his native parish. The excellence of Bewick's wood-engravings, and the talents of those who received their professional education under him, conjointly have contributed in a very great degree to restore a good engraving to the position which it formerly occupied as a branch of art, and to bring it to its present very high degree of excellence.

THREE PERSONS DROWNED IN THE RIVER. On Wednesday evening about seven o'clock, three unfortunate individuals were drowned off Battersea bridge, under the following melancholy circumstances:—It appears from information made upon the spot, that a waterman, a respectable person, named Wilson, a solicitor, about 30 years of age, was rowing up the river in a wherry, alone. He had passed through one of the arches of Battersea-bridge with rairoad speed, in consequence of the very strong current, when he was suddenly prevalent under the arches of this bridge, when the head of his boat came in collision with one of the numerous barges there stationed, and he was precipitated into the water, and disappeared. The bowman, rose twice, but the boat was driven with had pat off to his assistance had reached him he went down a third time, and was carried away by the tide. The second—as a young gentleman named Arthur Ryland, son of Mr. Ryland, the barrister, who undertook to make another gentleman from Putney to Chelsea. The match was well contested, and Mr. Ryland's opponent got through Putney-nudge first; Mr. Ryland was following when he boat struck against the bridge, and immediately went down. He sank instantly, and it is supposed that the exhausted state he was in prevented him from making any effort to save himself. The other unfortunate lost his life in a similar manner about the same time and place, and although the drags and boats were in immediate requisition, the body has not yet been recovered. The numerous accidents which are continually occurring at this bridge, call loudly for some speedy remedy to prevent the recurrence of them.

COLOSSAL STATUE OF THE LATE DUKE OF GORDON.

In our journal of last week we briefly announced the placing of this colossal statue on its pedestal, at about the middle of Castle-street, in the good city of Aberdeen. The figure was cut by Messrs. M'Donald and Leslie, after a model by Campbell, of London, from a block of granite brought from the Dancing Cairn Quarries, which weighed some 16 tons. It measures, including the plinth, 11 feet 3 inches. The pedestal is of red granite, from the Stirlinghill Quarries, near Peterhead; it stands 10 feet 3 inches, so that the height of the figure and pedestal is 21 feet 6 inches.

As a specimen of sculptural design, this work will greatly add to Mr. Campbell's already extensive fame. The Duke is represented in military character, leaning gracefully on his sword, with his left foot resting on a broken mortar. The gentle turn and downward inclination of the head, the simple arrangement of the drapery, and the calm and dignified repose that reigns over the whole, prove that the artist has not studied the antique in vain.

"The inspection of this work of art," says the Aberdeen Constitutional, "naturally leads one with pensive, yet not unpleasing associations, to call up recollections of him whose memory it is designed to perpetuate. He was the last of a noble family, whose name has long held a prominent part in the history of our country; he was possessed of personal accomplishments, and manners at once the most noble and engaging, joined to the greatest kindness of disposition; and we feel assured in saying, that to those who ever had the happiness of his acquaintance, no monument was required to induce them to cherish his memory."

Professor Traill, in his pamphlet "On the Introduction into Scotland of Granite for Ornamental Purposes," says, in reference to this statue, on his visit to the works of Messrs. M'Donald and Leslie: "Two men were at work on the drapery. They worked with fine chisels, held very obliquely, and urged on by iron mallets of two or three pounds in weight. The attitude of this statue is simple, and the features are said to be very like the original. This, which may be considered as the first specimen of a British statue of a single block of granite, in emulation of the durable monuments of ancient Egypt, is a memorial by the county to the late noble and gallant officer; and, when erected, will be a distinguished ornament to Aberdeen.

COLOSSAL STATUE OF THE LATE DUKE OF GORDON, AT ABERDEEN.

WHITEBAIT.

By JOHN TIMES.

[It should be explained that the following paper, written last spring for the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, appeared only in a portion of No. 81; it having been removed to make room for the intelligence of the lamented death of H. R. H. the Duke of Sussex. As the subject of Whitebait is of annually returning interest, we repeat the contribution, with additions.

Strange as it may appear in these paltry days of science, epicures, from generation to generation, flocked to Blackwall and Greenwich, to enjoy the delicacies of "a Whitebait Dinner," without possessing any actual knowledge of the delicacy itself. The little creatures, "fried silkworms," as Theodore Hook delighted to call them, were rapidly brought in myriads, with scores of their brown bread and-butter accompaniment, and, washed down with goblets of iced punch, as rapidly disappeared. Now and then, a lisping demoiselle inquired of her neighbour at table as to the natural history of the choice morceau; but the question was blinked with perverse ingenuity. Cabinet Ministers ate their "annual fish dinners;" fellows of learned societies, lord mayors and aldermen, pursy citizens and purse-proud parvenus; in short, all who could sport the luxury of a guinea dinner, "chequered in bulk as in brains," went to Blackwall or Greenwich—but all were in an equally parlous state of ignorance as to the Whitebait; in short, Lovegrove, who has sacrificed glittering millions, heeded not their natural history, but contented himself with the species of his customers.

"Implentur veteris Bacchi, pinguisque elopes,"

WHITEBAIT.

At length, Mr. Yarrell, the animal ichthyologist, proved historically and satisfactorily that the Whitebait was not, as had been supposed, the young of the shad, but a distinct species. In its habits, it differs from all other species of clupea that visit our shores or our rivers. From the beginning of April to the end of September, this fish may be caught in the Thames as high up as Woolwich or Blackwall, every flood-tide, in considerable quantity, by a particular mode of fishing to be hereafter described. During the first three months of this period, neither species of the genus clupea, or any sea-fish at all, except occasionally a young sprat, can be found and taken in the same situation by the same means. The young shad of the year are not two and a half inches long till November, when the Whitebait season is over; and these young shad are never without a portion of that spotted appearance behind the edge of the upper part of the operculum, which, in one species particularly, is so marked a peculiarity in the adult fish. The Whitebait, on the contrary, never exhibits a spot at any age: but, from two inches long up to six inches, which is the length of the largest Mr. Yarrell has seen, the colour of the sides is uniformly white.

About the end of March, or early in April, Whitebait make their appearance in the Thames, and are then small, apparently but just changed from the albuminous state of the young fry; whereas, the shad do not deposit their spawn till the end of June, or the beginning of July. During June, July, and August, immense quantities are consumed by visitors to the different taverns at Greenwich and Blackwall; in May too, and at the moment we are writing, the work of gourmandise is going on. Pennant says: Whitebait "are esteemed very delicious when fried with flour, and eaten during the season as a treat much in the lower order of epicures to the taverns contiguous to the places where they are taken." If this account be correct, there must have been a strange change in the grade of the epicures frequenting Greenwich and Blackwall since Pennant's days; for at present, the fashion of eating Whitebait is sanctioned by the highest authorities, from the court at St. James's Palace in the West, to the Lord Mayor and his court in the East; besides the philosophers of the Royal Society, and her Majesty's Cabinet Ministers. Who, for example, does not recollect such a paragraph as the following, which appeared in the Morning Post of the day on which Mr. Yarrell wrote his account of the Whitebait, September 10 1835:

"Yesterday, the Cabinet Ministers went down the river in the Ordnance barges to Lovegrove's West India Dock Tavern, Blackwall, to partake of their annual fish dinner. Covers were laid for thirty-five gentlemen."

For our own part, we consider the Ministers did not evince their usual good policy in choosing so late a period as September; the Whitebait being finer eating in July or August; so that their "annual fish dinner" must rather be regarded as a sort of prandial wind-up of the parliamentary session than as a specimen of refined epicurism. Mr. Yarrell states that the Whitebait fishery is continued "frequently as late as September; and specimens of young fish of the year, four and five inches long, are then not uncommon, but mixed, even at this late period of the season, with others of very small size, as though the roe had continued to be deposited throughout the summer; yet the parent fish are not caught, and are believed by the fishermen not to come higher up than the estuary, where, at this season of the year, nets sufficiently small in the mesh to stop them are not much in use."

"The particular mode of fishing for Whitebait, by which a constant supply during the season is obtained, was formerly considered destructive to the fry of fishes generally, and great pains were taken to prevent it by those to whom the conservancy of the fishery of the Thames was entrusted; but since the history and habits of this species have been better understood, and it has been ascertained that no other fry of any value can swim with them—which I can aver—the men have been allowed to continue this part of the occupation with little or no disturbance, though still using an unlawful net."—(History of British Fishes, vol ii., p. 204. Second Edit.)

The rule and order of the Lord Mayor and his court is, that "no person shall take at any time of the year any sort of fish usually called White-bait, upon pain to forfeit and pay five pounds for every such offence, it appearing to this court that under pretence of taking Whitebait the small fry of various species of fish are destroyed." How the civic parties justified the infraction of this law for their Whitebait course, is another matter.

Mr Yarrell describes the net by which Whitebait are taken as by no means large, measuring only about 3 or 4 feet in extent; but the mesh of the hose or bag end of the net, is very small. The boat is moored in the fairway, where the water is from 23 to 30 feet deep; and the net, with its wooden framework, is fixed to the side of the boat, as shown in the engraving. The tail of the hose, swimming loose, is from time to time handed into the boat, the end untied, and its contents shaken out. The wooden frame forming the mouth of the net does not dip more than four feet below the surface of the water; and, except an occasional straggling fish, the only small fry taken with the Whitebait, are stickebacks and the sparling or freckled grohy. The farther the fishermen go down towards the mouth of the river, the sooner they begin to catch Whitebait after the flood-tide has commenced. When full-sailing as high as Woolwich, the tide must have flowed from three to four hours, and the water become sensibly brackish to the taste, before the Whitebait will appear. They remain down the river with the first of the ebb tide; and various attempts to preserve them in well-boats in pure fresh water have uniformly failed.

The Thames fishermen who live at and below Gravesend, know the Whitebait perfectly, and catch them occasionally of considerable size in the small meshed nets used in the Upper and Lower Hope for taking shrimps, called drakes-nets, which are like Whitebait nets, only larger. The sprat-fishers take the adult Whitebait frequently on the Kentish and Essex coasts throughout the winter.

The Humble, which runs into the Southampton waters, is the only other southern river from which Mr. Yarrell has received Whitebait; but thus he believes to be owing rather to the want of a particular mode of fishing, by which so small a fish can be taken so near the surface, than to the absence of the fish itself; which, abounding as it does in the Thames, Mr. Yarrell has very little doubt might be caught in some of the neighbouring rivers on our south and east coasts. In the vicinity of the Isle of Wight, Whitebait, from their brilliancy and consequent attraction, are used by the fishermen as bait on their lines when fishing for white trout—hence the name.

Dr. Parnell has found Whitebait inhabiting the Frith of Forth in considerable numbers, during the summer months; and in the neighbourhood of Queensferry he has captured in one dip of a net, about a foot and a half square, between 500 and 600 fish, not more than two inches in length, mixed with sprats, young herrings, and fry of other fishes. "In their habits," says Dr. Parnell, "Whitebait appear to be similar to the young of the herring, always keeping in shoals, and swimming occasionally on the surface of the water, where they often fall a prey to aquatic birds." Whitebait being thus added to the delicacies of the Scottish table, it is expected to be hereafter sent to the Edinburgh market in such quantities as to render it as profitable as the sperling or smelt fishery.

Mr. Yarrell thus technically describes the Whitebait:—"The length of the head compared with that of the body alone is as two to five; the depth of the body compared to the whole length of the fish, as one to five: the dorsal fin commences half way between the point of the closed jaws and the ends of the short and middle caudal rays; the longest ray of the dorsal fin as long as the base of the fin; the ventral fin arises from behind the line of the commencement of the dorsal, and half way between the point of the closed jaws and the end of the longest caudal rays; the tail long and deeply forked. The fin rays in number are—D. 17: P. 15: V. 9: A. 15: C. 20. Vertebræ 56.

"The head is elongated; the dorsal line less convex than that of the abdomen; the scales deciduous; the abdominal line strongly serrated from the pectoral fin to the anal aperture. The lower jaw the longest and smooth; the upper slightly serrated, the tongue with an elevated central ridge without teeth; the eye large, the irides silvery; the upper part of the back pale greenish ash; all the lower part, the cheeks, gill-covers, and sides of the body white; dorsal and caudal fins coloured like the back; the latter tipped with dusky: pectoral, ventral, and anal fins, white." The only food Mr. Yarrell could find in the stomach were the remains of minute crustacea.

In conclusion, we must return to the prandial portion of our subject.

The vulgar axiom, that a certain unmentionable person "sends cooks," is falsified in the dressing of Whitebait for the table at Blackwall and Greenwich; since, we are persuaded that the famed delicacy of the dish rests almost as much upon its skilful cookery as upon the freshness of the fish. The mode of cooking, as practised at Lovegrove's, at Blackwall, has been "let out" by Dr. Pereira, in his excellent "Treatise on Food and Diet," lately published. The Doctor appears to have penetrated one of the "bat kitchens," and there to have been informed that the fish should be cooked within an hour after being caught, or they are apt to clog together; they are kept in water in a pan, from which they are taken, as required, by a skimmer. They are then thrown upon a layer of flour, contained in a large napkin, in which they are shaken until completely enveloped in flour; they are then put into a colleuder, and all the superfluous flour is removed by sifting; the fish are next thrown into hot lard contained in a copper cauldron or stew pan placed over a charcoal fire; in about two minutes they are removed by a tin skimmer, thrown into a colleuder to drain, and served up instantly, by placing them on a fish drainer in a dish. The rapidity of the cooking process is of the utmost importance; and if it be not attended to, the fish will lose their crispness, and be worthless. To temper their rashness, (for rash they are, despite the instantaneous cookery,) lemon juice is squeezed over them, and they are seasoned with cayenne pepper; brown bread and butter are substituted for plain bread, whilst they are "washed down" with punch, if iced, the better; and this combination of savoury, sweet, and acid, is one of the most delectable treats in the gourmandize of our days. It is scarcely a whit less refined than the epicurism of old Rome: since, our flocking to the banks of the Thames to insure the freshness of Whitebait is almost as studious an affair as the Roman mullet stews beneath the table, the killing of the beautiful fish in transparent vases, or suffocating them in the exquisite Carthaginian pickle. This latter freak of Apicius enables him to rank in our mind as the Lovegrove of his day.

To order dinner, "difficile est propriè." A "whitebait dinner" is often the very climax of this position: and the "public" tables of twos, threes, and fours, present many disagreeable illustrations of this difficulty; above all things, the superabundance of fried dishes in such repasts is loudly to be protested against, and we, unquestionably, have the diet-doctors on our side; for a less digestible meal than a succession of fried dishes can scarcely be devised, even with the advantage of the acid accompaniments. Mr. Walker ("Tom Walker," as he has been irreverently called), has a page upon the subject, in his "Original," which is somewhat to the purpose. In his lively paper for August 26, 1835, he says: "I will give you, dear reader, an account of a dinner I have ordered, this very day, at Lovegrove's, at Blackwall, where if you never dined, so much the worse for you. The party will consist of seven men besides myself, and every guest is asked for some reason—upon which good fellowship mainly depends; for people brought together unconnectedly had, in my opinion, better be kept separately. Light I hold the golden number, never to be exceeded without weakening the efficacy of conversation. The dinner is to consist of turtle, followed by no other fish but Whitebait, which is to be followed by no other meat but grouse, which are to be succeeded simply by apple fritters and jelly, pastry on such occasions being quite out of place. With the turtle, of course, there will be punch; with the Whitebait, champagne; and with the grouse, claret; the two former I have ordered to be particularly well iced, and they will all be placed in succession upon the table, so that we can help ourselves as we please. I shall permit no other wines, unless, perchance, a bottle or two of port, if particularly wanted, as I hold variety of wines a general mistake. With respect to the adjuncts, I shall take care that there is cayenne, with lemons cut in halves, not in quarters, within reach of every one, for the turtle; and that brown bread-and butter in abundance is set upon the table for the Whitebait. It is no trouble to think of these little matters beforehand, but they make a vast difference in convivial contentment. The dinner will be followed by ices, and a good dessert, after which coffee and one glass of liqueur each, and no more; so that the present may be enjoyed without inducing retrospective regrets. If the master of a feast wish his party to succeed, he must know how to command; and not let his guests run riot, each according to his own wild fancy. Such, reader, is my idea of a dinner, of which I hope you approve; and I cannot help thinking that, if Parliament were to grant me £10 000 a year, in trust, to entertain a series of worthy persons, it would promote trade, and increase the revenue more than any bugget-mugger measure ever devised."

WHITEBAIT FISHING.

We have heard Mr. Walker's carte objected to, and, we think, consistently; since, such of the party as were not attached to grouse, must have been at a loss for their third course, unless they were most pussy ready-set. However, the passage involves some excellent advice, and the sooner the reader follows it, the better for his mundane enjoyment.

A ROYAL GODMOTHER.—Extract of a letter from Venice, of the 12th of April: "Her Royal Highness the Duchess de Berri, on going yesterday afternoon to visit the church of San a Maria Formosa, noticed at its entrance a poor woman in rags, beside whom was another with a child in her arms. Affected by the appearance of the poor creatures, her Royal Highness approached the latter, and said, 'What is the matter with you, good woman?' Not knowing the rank of the lady who addressed her, she replied, 'Madam, this child is a week old, and I cannot find any one who will hold it at the font. The priests will not make it a Christian because I have no money to give them and I am obliged to keep it without baptism from this cruelty.' Her Royal Highness, moved to tears at the recital, said, 'I will hold your child, and be its godmother.' The priests were quickly called, and the infant was christened. On the book being presented for the sponsor to enter her name, to the astonishment of the priests, her Royal Highness wrote with her own hand 'La Duchesse de Berri.' You may imagine the bows and apologies that ensued. Her Royal Highness gave the poor woman 100*l.*, and paid the priests, who were in ecstasy. Such a trait does honour to the heart of the Duchess, of whose character every one speaks with enthusiasm."

Smoking is become an almost universal practice, and is used more as an amusement, or an assistance for guzzling, than for any good expected from it. However, it cannot be denied that smoking is beneficial to persons subject to defluxions on the lungs: it is a constant and strong revulsion; and phlegmatic coughs and hoarseness may be greatly relieved by it, when other remedies fail. But are healthy persons to be pinned down to rules which are only to be followed by subjects who breed too much phlegm? Persons should not tamper with tobacco during the summer, which is a season that dries humours. In short, the healthy, and they who are of warm constitution, should avoid it.—DR. STODDER.

THE "MORAL-WRONG" MAJORITY.

If it be true a member of the House of Commons declared when Lord Ashley first carried his proposition against the Government, that Sir R. Peel had been beaten by the Christian feeling of the Legislature, it is evident that the awakening to the sense of mercy and justice was but a transient one. There has been a speedy relapse into the expedient and the necessary as opposed to the humane; and though it is "morally wrong" to work women and children to death in factories and praiseworthy to come to a vote restraining this excessive toil, it is also "politically right" to rescind that vote when a regard for the health of the people might put in peril the existence of a ministry. One has been weighed in the balance against the other, and the selfishness of party has turned the scale. The Government is safe; Sir R. Peel will not resign; the country gentlemen are delivered from any present fears of the Whigs. Lord Ashley, with his inconvenient and embarrassing humanity, is shelved for the session, and a majority of 138 in favour of the toil of infants and of mothers proves that the Government still deserves the designation of the "strong" one. In all this there may be expediency, and the men of this school of statesmanship may congratulate themselves on their triumph. But there are other considerations connected with the subject, and these may lead to conclusions not quite so satisfactory.

The first—and worst—impression derived from the vote of Monday night, is that of the existence of a mass of political servility in the House of Commons, bowing down to the minister, and yielding up principles and opinions at his command with a facility unparalleled since the days of Walpole. What will be the effect of this? A disbelief in the virtue of public men is already deep and widely spread, and is producing the worst possible effect. Having a strong faith in none, the people are growing indifferent to all, and thus political infidelity is casting the same withering blight over public spirit in the affairs of the world, that falls on the thoughts of higher and better things, when the mind is unhappily infected by the kindred spirit of disbelief in that which is "the saving health of all nations." There is power placed in the hands of men in elevated stations—power to do good and evil. The hope of the many that this good will be done, though often sorely tried, is long in perishing altogether; but such disappointments as these hasten that decay, by making the heart sick. The people are compelled not merely to see but to feel that their lives, their health, their morals, their well-being in all things, are as nothing compared with the stability of a ministry. A few sincere and good men are their advocates from real depth of feeling; but whether these are joined by the greater mass of the men around them, depends entirely on whether the principle involved or measure proposed, can be converted into a party weapon, and used for the advantage of one side, or the damage of the other. A question that cannot be converted into "political capital"—as the Americans call it—is neglected by all parties alike. If we trace the progress of the Factory Question we shall find that it has been no exception to the rule. What it involves is as far as may be from a political question; yet it has been made the battle-horse of parties and the sections of parties, and alternately spurred by them so furiously into each other's ranks, that the question has broken down among them. The agricultural interest were not unlikely to listen with some favour to details which threw no slight odium on the mill-owners. And they did listen, and at last voted, not out of absolute regard for the working-classes, but in opposition to their masters, as if saying—"Our very love for you is hate to them." The mill-owners, on the other hand, were not slow to retort with a tu quoque, bidding the men of land look at the miserable condition of their own peasantry before they preached philanthropy and benevolence to the men of mills, and not forgetting to throw in very significant hints about restrictions on trade and commerce. They, also, to some extent, denied the facts alleged, and accused the Ten Hours' advocates of producing exaggerated evidence. But the accusing the agricultural interest of neglect of their labourers did not clear the manufacturers of the charge of indifference to the welfare of their millions of toilers, the wearied associates with the unresting, untiring steam-engine. Alas! one side only convicted the other; their mutual recriminations only proved to the world that they were both to blame.

But there is a section of the Liberal party who acted, we are convinced, from party motives alone, and displayed more undisguised party-spirit than either of the others. Those who are called the pure Whigs—the official wreck of the late Ministry—with Lord John Russell at their head, were all as deeply pledged to the principle of non-interference with labour as the Premier and the Home Secretary; in opposition to Lord Ashley, they had all spoken and voted against his plan in former years; had used all the arguments now brought forward against it, and had backed those arguments by their votes. The evils were as great then as now; the evidence of those evils was as complete, the earnestness of the noble champion of the movement not less deep, and his statements not less forcible. What had converted the Whigs to humanity? We confess we suspect all sudden changes of opinion, and we entirely disbelieve in the sincerity of a conviction only avowed, for the first time, when circumstances make it profitable. It has been thus with some of the supporters of the ten hours clause. To read their speeches, it might be imagined that they were like the Prioress of Chaucer. "all conscience and tender heart;" but the better feeling did not come over them till there was an opportunity of doing themselves a profit and their opponents an injury. Their new opinion may be good in itself; their votes and voices in the cause may be accepted; but as for the motives from which they are given, we fear they will not so well bear examination. And with respect to the recent vote, it is precisely the motives that have produced the change that will be the most strictly examined. Men will ask, why and whence is this sudden change? Why has the principle which was accepted and confirmed as a good one, some three weeks ago, by a majority of three, rejected as bad and impolitic now, by a majority of a hundred and thirty-eight? Whence has arisen this wholesale conversion of humane legislators back into cold political economists, who see in masses of men, women, and children, only machines for producing the wealth, no part of which they can ever enjoy? Some plead a prior "intoxication" of benevolence, from which they have had time to recover. These should evidently have adopted the advice of Talleyrand—"never act on your first impulse, as it is generally a good one;" for, according to the same school of public morality, a good action may, in politics, be "worse than a crime—a blunder." So the members who, in a state of moral and philanthropic intoxication, blundered into a transient humanity, have soberly reverted to that state of indifference to the toil and sufferings of the mass which becomes enlightened representatives of the people whose infants and women work twelve hours a day, and who are told by song and sentiment that Britons never shall be slaves.

What was it removed their delusion? What Treasury Puck squeezed the disenchanting juice upon their eyes and made them again see things in that true light cast on all such matters by self, and party interests? What woke them from their trance was the cry of the ministry in danger, and what converted them when awake was the threat—yes, the threat—of Sir R. Peel to resign if they again left him in a minority, or even in a majority that should be doubtful. And the spirits of expediency bowed to the bidding of the minister of whose policy expediency is the soul; they turned their backs upon themselves with an unanimity that was truly wonderful, and the strong Government was once more safe behind its overwhelming majority!

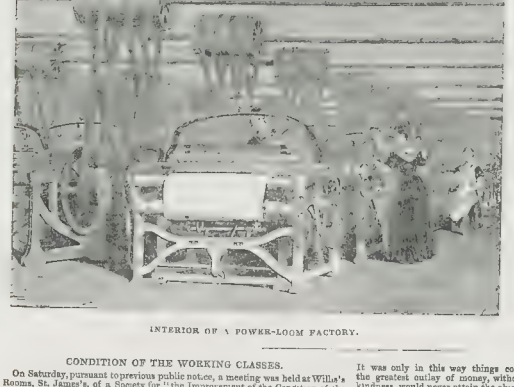
But now comes the question, what price has the triumph—for so has it been called—been purchased? Certainly by the forfeiture of that high opinion which men ought to possess of those to whom power is entrusted. The Legislature has convicted itself of a lack of stability to principle, and a want of independence of power. If mistrust of it as a body becomes more general than it is now, whose will be the fault? Assuredly not with the people, who cannot place belief in those who have no belief in themselves.

INTERIOR OF A POWER-LOOM FACTORY.

We are persuaded that the annexed engraving will be interesting to our readers, in connection with the great question of "The Factory Bill," which has just been disposed of by the Legislature.

The power-loom is now generally used in the cotton manufacture, for the weaving of plain cloth, and for the various kinds of twilled and figured goods; and Dr. Cooke Taylor considers that manual labour, at least for the coarser kinds of goods, must rapidly fall into disuse. In one respect, the power-loom has a very obvious advantage over the hand-loom: the batten, lay, or lathe, to which the reed is attached, drives home the weft to the rest of the web after it has been shot from the spindle; now a weaker or stronger blow of this lathe alters the thickness of the cloth, and after any interruption, the most experienced weaver finds it difficult to commence with a blow of precisely the same force as that with which he left off. In the power-loom, the lathe is given a certain steady blow; and, when once regulated by the engineers, it moves with unvarying precision from the beginning to the end of the piece. Hence, power-loom cloth is always of a more equable and regular texture than that woven by hand.

Power-looms are generally placed in sheds, lighted from the top by a single range of windows to every row of looms. The weavers, or rather, the tenters, have very little to do besides watching the machinery, and correcting any defects in the materials to be woven. As the labour is light, it is usually performed by women or young persons; and the business is stated to be so simple, that it may be learned in a month or six weeks. The moving power may be either the steam-engine or the water-wheel, or a combination of both. In the former case, the engine or engines work by cranks or cogs, so as to set in motion the horizontal shaft to which the fly-wheel belongs. From this shaft, motion is communicated to the main upright shaft, which again sets in motion horizontal shafts extending along the ceiling, as shown in the illustration. We are indebted for these details, as well as for the annexed engravings, to a clever work, entitled "England in the Nineteenth Century—Lancashire."



INTERIOR OF A POWER-LOOM FACTORY.

A power-loom factory generally occupies the ground-floor of an immense building, often six stories high; but sometimes, being necessary for the situation of the machines. In one of the principal power-loom factories near Stockport, for example, the dimensions of the room are 200 feet long, 50 feet wide, and 12 feet high, and afford space for several hundred looms. The price of one of these looms, a few years back, finished in the first style, by the first Manchester machine-makers, was no more than £9 15s.

CONDITION OF THE WORKING CLASSES.

On Saturday, pursuant to previous public notice, a meeting was held at Willis's Rooms, St. James's, of a Society for "the Improvement of the Condition of the Labouring Classes." There was a very large attendance of highly respectable persons, including a considerable proportion of ladies. Among the gentlemen on the platform were Lord Ashley, the Bishop of Salisbury, Viscount Clifden, Sir George Rose, Mr. Colquhoun, M.P., Mr. R. M. Milnes, M.P., Sir Walter Stirling, Bart., Mr. L. Horner, Hon. W. Cowper, M.P., Mr. Long (Suffolk), Hon. and Rev. Sidney Osborne, and the Rev. Prebendary Wood, Chaplain to Queen Adelaide.

The meeting had been called for 11 o'clock, and at a few minutes after

Lord Ashley took the chair, and proceeded to open the business. The noble lord appeared to be labouring under indisposition. He said, that they were convened there in order to form a Society the object of which should be to improve the condition of the working-classes. It was proposed to form a Society which should direct its attention to various branches of acknowledged public necessity, as connected with the condition of the labouring population of the kingdom. There were three main objects to which the Society would have to direct the attention of the public. The first was the improvement of the dwelling-houses of the poor in town and country. On the advantage of an improved system of ventilation and drainage he did not think it at all necessary to enlarge; but, in addition to those objects, it was highly desirable that an end should be put to a system which had sprung up in the rural districts, in the town districts, called the barrack system—under which two or three families, and (as he had himself often seen) even eight, nine, or ten persons were sleeping in a room not large enough for the accommodation of a single person in a comfortable condition of life. The next object to which it was proposed to call the attention of the Society was the extension, as far as it was possible to extend it, of the allotment system—or what, perhaps, would be a better term, the field-garden system—which, wherever it had been carried out, had produced the most satisfying benefits. He would assume it to be unnecessary to expatiate on the advantages derivable from this system, as he believed they were very generally admitted. (Hear.) The other object of the Society would be the formation of friendly loan societies, upon the principle of those which had been established in many parts of Ireland, and which had been found to produce the most beneficial results in the diminution of pauperism and the elevation of the character of the people. (Hear.) With respect to all these objects the difficulty lay, not in establishing the necessity for their attainment—in proving the existence of evils which were desolating the people, and which threatened to exterminate them—but in determining on the plan of operations the most fitting to carry out the design. Great difficulties would oppose themselves to the progress of the Society, but those difficulties would, he trusted, be overcome, and that the operations of the Society would be extended through the country by the formation of local and district associations, all acting on one uniform plan, and all ruled by the central or parent Society. (Hear, hear.) The clergy, magistracy, and landed proprietors were disposed to render every assistance in their different localities, whether by their individual exertions or in connexion with district societies.

The Rev. Hugh M'Neil, after some introductory observations with reference to himself and the circumstances which required his almost immediate departure for Liverpool, to be present at the confirmation of many of the poor of which had brought the meeting together, that the poor had feelings as well as real benefit. If noble lords, and right hon. and hon. gentlemen, the proprietors of lands and the proprietors of factories, would give themselves the trouble to make themselves personally acquainted with the poor under their charge—if they would spend hour after hour amongst their labouring poor—not grudging the interruption in the labourer's time necessary to make a fri end of the labourer himself—(cheers)—if they would go from farm to farm on their estates, and from room to room in their factories, manifesting an interest and cultivating a confidence, the best results might confidently be anticipated. (Cheers.)

It was only in this way things could be done. He was bold to say that the greatest outlay of money, without this outlay of sympathy and personal kindness, would never attain the object they had in view. (Cheers.) The poor had feelings as well as wants. He claimed respect for the poor man's character as well as compassion for the poor man's condition. (Cheers.) All squalid as he looked, bowed down under toil, what was he? He was a man; and what had he? All ruined and penniless as he appeared, he had reason, conscience, immortality. (Cheers.) Compared with these, what were mines and lands? what were stately mansions and gorgeous furniture? what the luxuries of the palace? what the rivalries of the Senate-house? what the dignities of the Cabinet? what all the conscience and so-called honour of an abstract philosophy? (Loud cheers.) Behold the labouring man—his brow was furrowed, yet he seemed not careworn—there was an air of serenity about him. His eye was sunk—perhaps his nourishment had not been sufficient—perhaps his home had been a home of sorrow—yet he did not seem discontented. There was an expression of satisfaction about him. He had not only reason, conscience, and immortality, but all these were sanctified—he was a Christian. God the Holy Ghost dwelt in him as in a temple—God the Son died for him, his brother—God the Father had adopted him as a child. These composed the true dignity of man—these would stand and shine in everlasting glory, when stars and honours among men, if dissociated from godliness, would shrink into nothingness. (Loud cheers.) But he was obliged to toil, he was obliged to labour, and labour hard, for his bread—he was so, but did this make him less respectable? There had gone abroad a most unchristian notion, that the necessity of constant labour was an evil; and that they were the favoured sons of Providence who were not under any necessity to toil for their livelihood. There could not be a greater mistake; for industry, independent of the blessed results that arose from it, was in itself most sweet and satisfactory. Industry relieved the mind from that distraction and that want of point and object which rendered the slothful man's path a bed of thorns. Industry was the guard of innocence; it was the daily check against those tendencies to vice which would otherwise manifest themselves in our fallen nature. And who was he that looked down on the toils of toil? Who despised the man who was obliged to labour for his bread? Who was he who, traversing the wide domains of his own estate, it might be, and looking from hill to hill, exulting in the pride of his possessions—

"Views the simple rustic hind,
"Whose toils upholde the glittering show,
"A creature of another kind,
"Some coarser substance unrefined,
"Placed for his lordly use, thus far below!"

(Cheers.) Who was he? It might be the slothful man—infected with the leprosy of wealth—the bane of those who had no employment they must attend to, and had no resources of mind to make an employment for themselves. Sloth was detestable, mischievous worse than useless. The slothful man was a disgrace to his species. The powers of mind and body which might be used to the glory of God and the good of fellow-creatures were frittered away, morning after morning, upon a prolonged toilet, which, when made, only made the wearer of it ridiculous (loud cheers); and evening after evening upon eating and drinking and pleasuring, which led to more and more extensive and deeper chains of selfishness and vanity. (Continued cheers). The man of toil was the man of the highest respectability. The man of daily, diligent, industrious toil for his family, who, by the sweat of his brow, under the solemn curse of our first parent, continued to produce materials for the support of himself and family—compare that man, returning with his stained person and his weary sinews from his toil to his home in the evening—compare him with the youth of fashion returning from his idle lounging ride or walk—which was more respectable? which was more an object of affection? on which would they lavish more attention? which would they have more respect for? (Cheers). He claimed respect for his poor friends' character. He asked the affection of their hearts for them; and then they would set about improving their dwellings and their condition, not with a cold attention, but with a warm heart. (Loud cheers.) It was in this way their object was to be gained, and in this way alone. The poor must be visited, not with the ostentation of condescension, which would barely wait for a reply to questions put with scarcely civility, and which, instead of good, inflicted a double evil—evil to those who indulged in such conduct, because it ministered to their own vanity and self-importance, and evil to those visited with it, because it provoked a reply of repugnance and hostility. They must be visited leisurely and kindly. The stories of their domestic troubles—their contentions and quarrellings with their neighbours must be listened to—their regrets must excite neither sneer nor smile—their wants and troubles must not be derided as insignificant—their failings must not be rudely assailed—nothing must be left unsatisfactorily underneath the poor—they must be attended to kindly and affectionately, because, he repeated, the poor had feelings as well as wants, and bounty must be accompanied with sympathy, or the grand object they had in view would never be accomplished. (Cheers.) The rev. gentleman concluded by moving the following resolution:—

"That it appears from various Parliamentary and other inquiries, that the labouring classes in this country are placed in circumstances which call for the efforts of an enlarged and well-directed benevolence to produce a permanent and effectual improvement in their condition."

A number of other resolutions in the spirit of the foregoing were proposed by several of the distinguished persons present, but our limits afford us only space for the eloquent appeal on behalf of the poor, which we extract from the speech of the Rev. Mr. Mc Neil.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

(From our own Correspondent.)

PARIS, May 14.

SPAIN.

Notwithstanding the flaming articles in the Spanish and French press, propagating the return to legal measures in the affairs of Spain, and a certainty that, under the new Administration, that unhappy country will be restored to peace and prosperity, with regret I feel bound to state that my knowledge of Spain and Spanish affairs is such, that, in my opinion, the present Ministers, be their intentions ever so fixed, cannot control the different intriguing parties now actively at work to bring about anarchy and disorder. You cannot but have noticed, that at each change of Ministry the same language has been held by the Spanish Ministerial press—promising much and doing little; and yet all the most eminent men have in their turns held the reins of power. During the last twelve months there have been seven Cabinets formed, without including the Provisional Government installed at Barcelona under the Presidency of General Serrano. The first was the Rodil Cabinet, which was overturned on the 9th of May, 1843, and was replaced by that of M. Olozaga, which lasted only ten days. Next came the Cabinet of Gomez Bueria, which lasted sixty-five days; this was succeeded by the reconstitution of the Lopez Cabinet, which lasted four months. The fifth Ministry was that of M. Olozaga, which lasted, was that of Rodil, only ten days, and was replaced by that of Gonzalez Bravo, which held fifty-four days' existence. We have now the seventh Cabinet—that of General Narvaez. How long this will last it is difficult to say. In the meantime the Carlist insurrection is daily gaining strength. In the Maestrazgo, in the kingdom of Valencia, the Carlists have already had several conflicts with the Government troops, in one of which Colonel Marzil was killed. The greater part of Andalusia and the province of Bargos are overrun with Carlist guerillas.

The property belonging to Don Manuel Godoy, Prince of Peace, has been restored to him, after having been thirty-six years under sequestration. Those of the greatest value, are the Palace of Buena Vista, the Lake of Valencia, the Pastorage of Alcudia, and the Palace of the Ministers.

Gonzalez Bravo, the late President of Ministers, has been named Envoy Extraordinary, and Minister Plenipotentiary to the Court of Lisbon.

The Queen and Christina continue to pay their court to the clergy; everyday their majesties give a new proof of their religious feelings. On the 6th, having met a procession with the host, they accompanied it on foot to the place of its destination.

Nothing as yet known as to the intentions of the Ministers, as regards the convocation of the Cortes. It is generally believed that no determination will be come to until an answer shall be received from M. de Viluma, now in London. Persons generally well-informed are of opinion that Narvaez had decided upon a dissolution.

ITALY.

The news from Italy is very barren this week. In the night of the 4th, the inhabitants of Catania were roused from their beds by a slight shock of earthquake. On the evening of the 10th, a new eruption of the principal crater of Etna was visible from Naples.

GERMANY.

Negociations are being carried on for incorporating with the Prussian Monarchy, by means of purchase or exchange, the principality of Birkenfeld, which belongs to the Grand Duchy of Oldenburgh.

The railroad between the cities of Hanover and Brunswick is completely finished, and was opened on the 19th. By means of this road, which runs from Anhalt to Berlin, and from Magdeburg to Dresden by Leipsic, passengers may now go and return to and from Hanover and Berlin, and Hanover and Dresden, in one day. The journey from Berlin to Copenhagen is now performed in twenty-four hours.

It [illegible] is announced to the community of Israelites of Frankfort that [illegible] intructed by his father, Mr. Solomon Rothschild, of Vienna, in consequence of the turn which certain affairs of the community have recently taken, to revoke his donation of 150,000 florins for the building of a new synagogue.

It is intended to form a railway between Mentz and Neustadt, at the foot of the Hasrat, and make a junction with the Rhenish road from Bavaria to the French frontier.

A letter from Tharandt (Saxony), of the 4th of May, states that Count de Seckendorf, aged 17 years, had been condemned to three years and a half's imprisonment for killing, in a duel, one of his comrades, a young gentleman of his own age; the two persons who conveyed the challenge, to three months; and the four seconds, to two months.

FRANCE.

The Emancipation of Slaves now engrosses all the attention of the Parisian population; the Right of Search, and Tahiti, seem to be forgotten. On the subject one of our morning papers has the following article:—"If slavery," says the Siecle, "were abolished in our colonies, there is no doubt that St. Domingo would give herself at present to France, not under the name of Colony, but as protegé; and that we should behold our maritime influence become greater perhaps than it ever was. In the present situation of affairs, the English, who have emancipated their negroes, possess over us an advantage of which they will, without scruple, avail themselves. Already, according to letters from London, the English Cabinet have determined on offering us to share the protectorship of the island should circumstances require such a step. The English would take for their share the ancient Spanish part. The English Government could not, in consequence, with a frightful rapidity; our wretched Government never dares decide, except on doing nothing. Public opinion must therefore make itself known on this occasion. If France is to share the Protectorate of Hayti, it is with Spain, and not with England. So justice decides, as well as sound policy."

The report of the King's intended visit to England is revived. The Maritime Prefect of Cherbourg has sent an order to Havre for several silk flags, on which are to be embazoned the arms of England and France. The King and all the royal family leave the Tuileries to-morrow, for Neuilly. It is said that Majesty will shortly pay a visit to Chateau d'Eu.

The works for the camp near Metz have been commenced. During the manœuvres to be performed by the troops who are to be encamped, the Duke de Nemours will preside at the Chalmont and its environs of Metz. It is reported that a second camp will be formed in the Landes near to Bordeaux under the command of the Duke de Montpensier.

On Saturday last there were three five-franc pieces, with the head of the Duke de Bordeaux, are in recent circulation at Lyons.

During the last month the consumption of meat in Paris was 6759 oxen, 1146 cows, 1146 calves, 36,498 sheep; being 1683 oxen, 986 calves, and 2619 sheep more, and 197 cows less than in April, 1843. This increase, which is very considerable, must be attributed to the great influx of strangers to the capital.

On Saturday several persons were seen on the top of the column of Napoleon, in the Place Vendôme. After resting a few minutes, they descended their flight towards the east.

Count Mortier, of the 3rd Regiment of Artillery, nephew of Marshal Mortier, who fell a victim to the infernal machine of Fieschi, was killed a short time ago in Africa, by a gunner of his own regiment, who discharged a musket at him, without giving a very short distance. The assassin has been arrested.

On the second of the present month, during a confirmation given by the Bishop of Sizz, at Fiers, in the Orne, the congregation, at an unfounded alarm that a part of the building was falling, rushed to the door with such haste, that twenty persons were crushed to death, and upwards of fifty wounded.

A few days ago the rain fell in such abundance in a portion of the department of the Aube, that in some of the villages the houses were inundated, the water reaching to the height of more than three feet. At Pouy two bridges were carried away, and other damage was occasioned.

The new game law is being enforced with great severity. On Friday a quantity of game, intended for sale at Bondy, was seized at the barrier of that city. At Paris, there is no longer a display of game in the shops of the "marchands de comestibles."

The attendance in the Champ de Mars on the 12th, the fourth and last day of the Races, was more select than numerous. The Duke de Nemours was on the course.

The Special Minister of Commerce Plate of 4000 francs, for horses and mares of three years old, and upwards, foaled in France, and whose pedigree is traced on the French stud-book, was cleverly won by Drummer, the property of Baron A. de Rothschild.

The Produce Stakes of 500 francs was won by the Prince de Beauveau's Commodore Napier.

A Handicap of 2000 francs, for horses and mares of three years old, and upwards, was won by the Count de Blangy's W.

The Hurdle Race of 1500 francs, offered by the Jockey Club, was, after a hard struggle, and much manœuvring, won by Tiger, the property of Baron A. de Rothschild.

Owing more to the unprecedented influx of strangers, than to the merit of the pieces represented, the Opera is nightly crowded. Carlotta Grisi made her appearance, for the first time since her return from England, in "Giselle;" on Monday last she danced in "La Peri;" she was on both occasions most enthusiastically applauded. Taglioni has arrived in Paris, and will, in a few days make her début at the Grand Opera. Mademoiselle Dobrée has been well received in Charles VI. and Comte Ory. "Aline," one of the best works of Berton, will soon be produced at the Opera Comique. "Galatea" is in rehearsal.

Mademoiselle Carenka de Dietz will leave us in a few days, for London. M. Vivier, the celebrated horn player, also leaves for London; he will make his début at Thalberg's concert, on the 29th.

Mademoiselle Elliker has been received with great enthusiasm at Vienna; she made her début in "Gazelle."

Mesdames Vardot-Garcia and Tadolini, and Messrs. Ronconi, Roubre, and Marini, are the delight of the musical amateurs of the Austrian capital. There lately arrived in Vienna, Mesdames Montenegro, Albani, and Catanee; and Messrs. Fereti, Gardoni, and Ivanoff. Donizetti remains in Vienna during the musical season.

De Verde's "Lombardi" has had a success almost without example at the theatre Landovico, at Leghorn. On his road to Paris, Signor Cavalino, first clarionet at the theatre of La Scala, gave a concert at Genoa. According to the local papers, such sounds were never yet produced on that instrument. It is said Cavalino intends to visit England.

PARIS, Thursday. —This being a close holiday, the Bourse was closed, as was also the Post-office, at an early hour. Yesterday the business was extremely flat till nearly the close, when a slight reaction took place, by which the French 3 per cents. gained an advance of 15 c. for account.

AMERICA.—IMPORTANT INTELLIGENCE.

The packet ships Samuel Hicks, Captain Bancker, and the New York, Captain Cropper, both arrived at Liverpool on Sunday from New York: the latter sailed on the 9th, and the former on the 10th. The intelligence is nine days later than that received by the last arrival.

The absorbing topic at New York was the treaty for the annexation of Texas to the United States, and it now appears that this measure is all but complete. The New York Journal of Commerce's correspondent at Washington says—

I learn that the treaty proposes to annex Texas as a territory. If it be ratified, it will not follow that Texas is immediately to come into the Union as a state or states. That will be a question for the action of both houses of Congress. The Constitution says, Congress may admit new states into the Union. They can be brought in in no other way. When the subject of admission shall come before Congress, the terms of admission may be proposed, as in the case of the admission of Missouri. The prohibition of slavery may and will be proposed by Congress; some may also be offered and agreed to, by which slavery may be excluded from a portion of the territory, though nature and climate have provided for that exclusion, without the aid of legislation.

The great battle will not be upon the treaty, but upon the proposition to admit Texas as a state; and that will not be fought till after the presidential election is over. Mr. Clay and Mr. Van Buren are both for ratifying the treaty, and no one may be called for the purpose of considering that matter, if the next regular session is too far off.

A suggestion has been thrown out that Congress may annex Texas to the Union, simply by a legislative act, which requires a large majority in each house. I shall not be surprised to see it tried, should it be ascertained that a majority of the Senate will support the treaty, but that the two-thirds cannot be got. I should be sorry to see such a measure resorted to. It would be a doubtful and dangerous stretch of power. But the fact is, the same influences that will carry a majority of the Senate for the measure, will carry two-thirds and three-fourths of it.

(From the New York Herald.)

WASHINGTON, April 13.—The course which Mr. Calhoun has taken relative to the Oregon boundary has arrested the negociation upon that question with Mr Pakenham. Nor can it be resumed again until Mr. Pakenham shall have obtained further instructions from his government.

The facts respecting the interference of England with Texas, are of an astounding character, and cannot fail to exasperate the people of this country, who will not allow a foreign power to interfere in a family quarrel between the United States and Texas.

We learn the following from the same source

THE OREGON NEGOCIATION.—This negociation, as I informed you a fortnight ago, has been suspended. It was the wish of this government to bring that negociation to a close, and to offer a treaty to the Senate, simultaneously with the Annexation Treaty. But several difficulties interposed, some of which I have therefore referred to. But, in addition to these, there was a want of power, on the part of the British Minister, to treat upon the basis proposed by Mr Calhoun. Mr. Calhoun promptly, and with a candour and frankness unusual with diplomatists, proposed his ultimatum, to wit: the parallel of forty-nine as the northern boundary of the United States. Mr. Pakenham's instructions did not allow him to accept it.

The tariff question may also be considered as settled, for the present. The declaration of Mr. Crittenden, made from a knowledge of the sentiments of Senators, that no change can or will be made in the tariff this session, is a matter. But the course of the house also settles it. The house will proceed, to-day, to go into committee on the new tariff bill—yeas 90, nays 92. This vote is considered as decisive of the views of the house.

LATER FROM HAYTI.—We are informed by Captain Steeples, of the schooner Malvina, arrived last evening from the city of St. Domingo (which port she left on the 21st March) that the insurgents had a force of 2000 men under arms, and about 5000 on the island. The new Governor, chosen by the present population, had just arrived from Curaçoa, and was acting as generalissimo of all the forces.

There had been skirmishing on the lines between the belligerents, and a number killed, the particulars of which had not transpired.

It is thought the place will be able to hold out for some time, as persons in favour of a rebellion are in the country. Most of the Haytiens have left for Jacmel and Curaçoa. Business is very dull, and American produce brings good prices.

ARRIVAL OF THE ACADIA.—The Acadia, Captain Ryrie, arrived at Liverpool, at three o'clock on Wednesday morning, and landed her mails from Boston and Halifax; she brings likewise 101 passengers, and has had a fine passage of ten days and a half. She left Boston on the 1st, and Halifax on the 4th instant; her papers are, consequently, thirteen days later than we previously had.

We obtain the most important intelligence in the papers before us —

LATE FROM TEXAS.—The Neptune, at New Orleans on the 11th, brings some interesting advices from Texas. Mr. Elliott, H.B.M. Commissioner to Texas, we learn, came passenger in the Neptune from Galveston. Captain Elliott, we understand, has retired from the mission, and is now on his return to England, intending to pass, previous to his departure, for the benefit of his health, which is not good, some time at the White Sulphur Springs in Virginia. The journals of Texas express much regret at Captain Elliott's departure from their country. The result of the Texan mission to Mexico had not transpired in Texas at the departure of the Neptune. It was not believed, however, that any permanent or definite arrangement had been made. Private letters, which we have seen, lead to the supposition that the policy which Mr. Bankhead, the present British Minister to Mexico, is charged with, will put a new face on the relations of Mexico and Texas, in case the latter country be not received into this confederacy.

The following is a brief abstract of the treaty with Texas which has been laid on the table of Congress:—1. The treaty cedes to the United States the whole territory of Texas, to be annexed as a territory, subject to the same conditions as other territories. 2. The citizens of Texas are to be admitted to all the privileges of citizens of the United States, as soon as qualified according to the Federal Constitution. 3. The United States are to undertake the settlement of all titles and claims to real estate in Texas. 4. The public lands of Texas to be subject to the laws regulating the public lands of other territories. 5. The United States assumes the public debt and other liabilities of Texas, estimated not to exceed ten millions of dollars, to be liquidated by successive instalments. 6. Four commissioners to be appointed to examine into the validity of certificates and claims to land. The remaining provisions are merely formal.

Mr. Van Buren objects to the treaty on the ground that it may involve a war with MEXICO. The Senate have referred the treaty to the Foreign Committee. The Tariff Bill was carried in a committee of the whole house by a majority of 104 to 94.

NEWS FROM THE RIVER PLATE.—Private letters state that General Rivera, in the Department of Maldonado, some twenty leagues from Monte Video, completely routed General Gomez, who had sent under his command the principal part of Orbe's cavalry.

HAVANA, March 30. —The city is somewhat agitated by the recent developments in regard to the contemplated negro insurrection at Matanzas. Almost all the labourers are in prison, which greatly delays the freighting of vessels. It is said that the revolt was to have broken out on Thursday, the 3rd inst., and that a general butchery and the poisoning of food were at once to be employed to massacre the whites. It is further stated that last night the negroes on four sugar plantations, some six leagues from the city, either revolted or were to have risen. Troops have been dispatched to the scene of disaffection.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT

HOUSE OF LORDS.—MONDAY.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR took his seat on the woolsack at the usual hour.

Lord BROUGHAM moved the second reading of the Criminal Laws Consolidation Bill, the object of which was to effect a complete digest, not only of the criminal statute laws but also of the common law, reducing it to written principles, so that the whole might form a certain criminal code easily understood and easily carried into execution.—The LORD CHANCELLOR said the subject was a most important one, upon the propriety of the first part of the bill that relating to the consolidation of the statute law—a doubt could scarcely be entertained. Upon the second part, however, he felt so much doubt as to induce him to pause. He therefore recommended to his noble friend to have the bill read a second time that night, and thus to pledge their lordships to the principle of his measure, after which he ought to take no further step this session, but to give time for inquiry and to introduce it in the next session of Parliament. In the meantime the Government would take the matter up in conjunction with his noble friend, and every effort would then be made to render the measure as effective as possible. It might also be advisable immediately to repeal a number of dormant statutes, the revival of which might lead to inconvenience.—Lords DENMAN and CAMPBELL concurred in the propriety of this course of proceeding.—Lord BROUGHAM assented, and the bill was read a second time.

Their lordships then adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—MONDAY.

The Solicitor-General (Mr. Thesiger) took the oaths and his seat for Abingdon.

Mr. S Murray made the usual declaration as a Roman Catholic member.

Sir T. FREMANTLE moved the issue of a new writ for the borough of Launceston, vacant by the recent appointment of Sir H. Hardinge to the Governorship of India.—Lord HOWICK asked whether the acceptance of office by Sir H. Hardinge was not necessary in vacating a seat in the house? He doubted if, by a recent act, it did so.—Sir T. FREMANTLE said he had already referred to the act mentioned by the noble lord, and his opinion was that the seat became vacant on the acceptance of the office.—Sir R. INGLIS: This was an office which was not exactly under the Crown, hence the difficulty that appeared to have arisen.—Lord HOWICK: According to his notion the vacating of the seat was occasioned by the length of absence from this country, and not simply on account of the appointment.—Mr. M. GIBBS: There was another circumstance to be considered, and that was whether Sir H. Hardinge could be regarded as the Governor-General of India before he had reached Calcutta, and been sworn into office (Hear.)—It being understood by reference to the act, that the seat was vacated by the appointment of the right honorable baronet, the SPEAKER put the question that a new writ do issue, which was agreed to.

Colonel WOOD was glad to see the honorable the Secretary for the Home Department if it was his intention to originate any legislative measure, based upon the report of the commissioners who visited South Wales in the autumn of last year, and if so, when its introduction to the house might be expected?—Sir J. GRAHAM: It is my intention to introduce a bill founded upon the report of that commission. The bill is already in an advanced stage of preparation, and I hope to be in a position to lay it before the house in the course next week.—Colonel WOOD, in consequence of that intimation, begged to postpone the bill he had introduced until the measure of her Majesty's Government appeared.

Mr. LIDDELL, in reference to articles in the Morning Herald and Times, said the imputations against him were unjust, for he had been absent from all the former discussions on the Factories Bill, and had never given any one reason to suppose that he was favourable to the principle of ten hours labour.

Mr. M. MILNES resumed the adjourned debate on the Factory Bill, designating the labour for long hours as the white slavery of this country, and contending that we should be ready to make as great sacrifices to check it as we had done already for the emancipation of the slaves in our colonies.—Mr. WAKLEY said, as it had been shown that the factory operatives were better off than other class of workpeople, there was no pretence for any interference with them. By the principles of free trade, he felt confident they would cause the demand for the labour of the operatives to cease altogether.—Mr. M'GEACHY said the operatives were of opinion that the additional wages paid for the long hours went into the pocket of the doctor, and not into that of the operative, who were willing to submit to the increase of labour for the sake of mental improvement and recreation.—Mr. M. SUTTON said, that out of 130 operatives examined by Mr. Horner, in the presence of Mr. M'Gregor, no less than 70 of them stated that the wages paid all the dyers in the trade, and not more than 30 of them stated that the wages paid all the dyers in the trade before that the Government would for one moment think of sacrificing its position, should it be defeated on the present occasion.—Sir R. PEEL said, if might have been wrong on the part of the Government to resist the amendment by twelve in the day, but that error was no apology for those who proposed to put them to ten. The right hon. baronet entered into a series of calculations, in order to show that the proposition now made, would, if carried, be effective of the reduction of the hours of labour from twelve to ten. In England, the hours of labour were already considerably less than in any other country in Europe or the United States, and to return to them in this country in a still greater extent, the result of which must be the diminution of our exports, and a deterioration of wages to a greater extent even than the proportionate difference between ten and twelve. If the house had not, as it had just been said, Whig they should persevere to enforce the restriction to ten hours they must do so under other guides, for he could not consent to hold office for the purpose of carrying out a principle he believed to be so very injurious. (Cheers.) Lord J. RUSSELL thought it not right to mix up this great question with a ministerial question of confidence, for there was an end to argument, it it was converted into a party question. On a division the ministry obtained there so large a majority.—Sir R. INGLIS and Mr. COLLETT subsequently addressed the house, which then divided, and the motion of Lord Ashley was defeated, by a majority of 297 to 179.—On the question that the bill be read another division took place, and the motion was agreed to by a majority of 136 to 7. The house adjourned at two o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—TUESDAY.

Mr. Greene, with other members of the House of Commons, brought up the Factories Bill, which was, before the house rose, read a first time.

Some private bills were also brought up by the same messengers from the Commons, and likewise read a first time.

The Rajah of NORMANBY moved for a return of various papers connected with the dismissal of Mr. Gray from the office of stipendiary magistrate, for improper conduct in employing a police constable to sing a ballad-singer.—Lord WHARNCLIFFE stated the facts connected with the case, and said that an inquiry was instituted by the Government, which terminated in the dismissal of Mr. Gray, and the suspension of an inspector of police, who was implicated in the improper transaction. If, after this, the noble marquis wished to persevere, there could be no objection to the production of the papers.—The Marquis of CLANRICARDE said the attempted vindication of the Government was not complete, for they should have dismissed Mr. Gray four months previously, and should have dismissed, instead of suspended, the inspector.—A discussion ensued, in which the Earl of Wicklow, the Earl of Winchilsea, and Earl Fortescue took part; after which the papers were ordered.

The second reading of the Factories Bill was fixed for Monday next.

Lord MILTON then, in moving for a return respecting her Majesty's ship Queen, complained that that vessel—one of the finest in the service, and which, from the novelty of her construction, had excited much interest among nautical men—had been allowed to lie idle for almost her full term of service in Malta harbour, instead of, by frequent trials with other ships, testing the merits of the system on which she had been built.—Lord HARDWICKE said, that as to the charge of neglect, or the imputation on the conduct of the Admiralty, for which he thought his noble friend had made out no case whatever. It was the duty of the Admiralty to see, as far as possible, that the ships of the line kept tight, and that the Queen had done a great deal more tried than the noble lord seemed to have imagined. The motion was then negatived without a division.

At the rising of the house their lordships adjourned over Good Friday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—TUESDAY.

On the motion of Lord M. HILL, a new writ was ordered for the election of a member for the Kilmarnock district of burghs, in the room of Mr. A. Johnston, deceased.

The first regular motion of general public importance was one by

Mr. SHARMAN CRAWFORD, who, in a speech in which he enforced his views, asked for leave to bring in a bill to extend the parliamentary suffrage, and to secure the free representation of the people. He was supported by Dr. Bowring; and a division being called for before any reply was made to these speeches, the motion was rejected by 97 to 34.

The next business was a motion by Mr. WATSON, who brought under the consideration of the house the nature of the recent act, 5 and 6 Vic., c. 103, awarding compensation to the Six Clerks in Chancery, whose offices were abolished. These compensations had been valued by a competent authority, and it was calculated that they would cause a charge upon the nation in the course of the next forty years of one million of money. The annual sum to be paid was £78,741 14s. 11d. out of the pockets of the suitors. The offices of the Six Clerks were ancient offices, but latterly the duties had been very much limited, employing but a few clerks, who had merely a monopoly of a business—to conduct the business of the Court of Chancery. In the reign of Charles II. there were ninety of these persons. They had little or no duty to perform; in fact, they were an absolute obstruction to the public business; they had little more to do than to attend at their offices in Chancery-lane; and some of those individuals were now receiving upwards of £7,000 a year. Hear. They were declared to be entitled to a compensation of £5,500 a year for life, and he did hope the house would think that it was a case which called for the most rigid inquiry. Their fees depended on the number of suits prosecuted, and employed but a few clerks, and common language. The plantations have yielded in one year 20,000 cwt. of sugar, 54,000 gallons of rum, 18,000 gallons of molasses, and some cotton. But as large tracts are unfit for the production of colonial articles, maize, ground provisions, and fruits are cultivated to a considerable extent.

The town of St. Thomas is built on the north shore of a fine bay, which is about three miles long, and two wide, and has good anchorage for 200 vessels. It derives its importance from being a free port, open to all nations, and, consequently, a great entrepôt for articles of plantation consumption, such as timber, corn, and flour, which are brought to it in large quantities from the United States. The town is built on three conical hills, of nearly equal elevation, on which stand some well-constructed fortresses, commanding the harbour and shipping. The houses are built of stone or brick, and are tiled in the Dutch manner. The population is stated to exceed 3000 individuals, of whom 400 are whites. The Virgin Islands, generally, are subject to earthquakes, but the shocks are slight, and are not attended with such dreadful consequences as in the Antilles, which are farther to the south-east.

Our illustration has been engraved from an effective drawing, by Lieut. Bellairs, R.N. The view is taken from "Wright's Wharf."

THE GREEK PATRIOT KALERGI.

Demetrius Kalergi (who has taken so distinguished a position in the recent revolution in Greece), was born in Candia, and is now about 38 years of age. His father having established himself at Taganrog, on the sea of Azof, it was there he received his early education. He is a nephew of Emanuel Kalergi, who, from a subaltern in the Russian navy, became, through the friendship of the celebrated Potemkin, one of the richest men of the Russian dominions.

KALERGI, THE GREEK PATRIOT.

Soon after the breaking out of the Greek revolution, Kalergi's two elder brothers—Nicholas and Emanuel—having resolved on joining the cause, and being about to proceed to Greece with arms and ammunition, Demetrius, though still at school and but 15 years of age, could not be prevented by his relatives from accompanying them. Throughout the war of independence, he distinguished himself by his remarkable bravery. By a coup de main he succeeded in taking Karahusa in 1825, with a few men; and at the battle fought between the Greeks and Turks in the plain of Athens in 1827, having been severely wounded, he was made a prisoner. The bravest of the Ortans, among whom was his brother Emanuel, were slain around him. By the Seraskier's orders he was brought into his presence on a man's back; and after asking him some questions, he ordered him to be decapitated—a ceremony that had been already performed on several hundreds. The Albanian Bey, however, who had taken him prisoner, claimed him as his own; and the commotion this individual raised on seeing himself about to be deprived of the chance of making a profit out of his prisoner was so great, that the Seraskier at last consented to spare his life, and contented himself with slitting off one of his ears to send to Constantinople.

Kalergi, thus rescued from the Seraskier's fury, was ransomed by the payment of 5000 Spanish dollars, raised with difficulty among the English and other Philhellenes in the neighbourhood, who each received, together with the money they advanced on this occasion, a letter of thanks from Kalergi's uncle, in Russia.

His marriage was remarkably romantic. Two cousins, Primates of Corinth, disputed the hand of a celebrated beauty of that place; and to such an extent did their rivalry reach, that a civil war was carried on by them in this district for a considerable time, in spite of the vicinity of the Turkish army ready to annihilate the entire population. Kalergi, who was despatched by the Government to quell these disturbances, hit upon an efficacious method of doing so, by carrying off the fair one, and marrying her himself.

On the arrival of the President, Capo d'Istria, in Greece, in 1828, he promoted Kalergi to the rank of Lieutenant-Colonel of cavalry, and appointed him his aide-de-camp. After the President's assassination, and in the civil war that followed, he took an active part in opposition to the Provisional Government, hovering round Nauplia with his armed bands, and cutting off the supply of water, even when the French had garrisoned that fortress.

On the establishment of the Royal Government, he was deprived of his command, to make room for the Bavarians. He was even arrested, on suspicion of being concerned in one of the numerous conspiracies the injustice and mal-administration of the Regency so soon gave rise to; but he was set at liberty by the Court Martial of Navarino, presided over by General Gordon. Kalergi has occasionally, since that time, visited the various capitals of Europe, including London, where, or at Paris, we believe, his wealthy cousin is now residing; but all that was ever seen of him for ten years in the capital of Greece was during an annual visit, when the dashing young colonel was allowed the honour of dancing the Mazurka with the Queen—an honour the more remarkable, as the distinction of becoming the partner of Royalty in the dance was seldom or never conferred on a Greek, as long as the Bavarians remained in the country.

About ten years ago he received the command of the Lancers. The distinguished part he performed, during the events of last autumn in Athens, have so lately been described in all the European newspapers, that it is not necessary to repeat an account of them here. Suffice it to say, that had it not been for his firmness, courage, and, above all, his good sense and moderation, it would have been utterly impossible to prevent those events from degenerating into scenes of anarchy and bloodshed. King Otho has rewarded him by appointing him, on the day on which he signed the Constitution, his aide-de-camp, and by promoting him to the rank of Major-General.

In person he is slim and well made, and in his Lancer's uniform, of dark green with crimson facings, he has a distinguished appearance. His manners in society are those of a highly-polished gentleman of the Russian school. With his officers and soldiers he is an universal favourite, from his convivial character and open-handed liberality.

WASHINGTON.

The city of Washington, the seat of the American Government, has just been the scene of two events of a very opposite character—the signature of the treaty for the annexation of the Republic of Texas to the United States, and the delivery of a Message by the President in communicating this treaty to the Senate; besides an affray in the House of Representatives, and the attempted assassination of one of its members. The following details, dated Washington, April 23, are from the New York Sun:—

"A most disgraceful scene took place on the floor of the House of Representatives to-day. It grew out of a discussion on the Tariff Bill, in committee of the whole, and was the only business done. Mr. Wright, of Indiana, had the floor first this morning, and defended the bill. Mr. White (Whig), of Kentucky, replied to him, and went on to denounce the charge that Henry Clay had sold himself to J. Q. Adams, &c. After Mr. White had consumed his hour, Mr. Kennedy, of Indiana, remarked that the charges were all true. Mr. Wise, of (Democrat), of New York, said the charges were true, and would be proved. White, being thus contradicted, made a pass at Rathbun, and both clinched. The younger members all rushed to the conflict, and separated the combatants.

"While this conflict was raging inside the bar, one William S. Moore, a cripple, who has been here for several weeks to obtain a claim from Government, attempted to intrude within the house, was prevented, and discharged a pistol at Mr. M Causlin, of Ohio, a member. The ball missed the mark of the would-be assassin, and wounded an officer of the Capitol. Moore was taken into custody. The whole affair was referred to a committee of five for investigation, with instructions to report a bill for the punishment of offences committed within the house. At the solicitation of friends, Mr. Rathbun and Mr. White shook hands, amid the applause of the house. Thus that affair ended. Moore was retained in custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms of the house. The officer is not mortally wounded. The ball entered the thigh. His name is John L. Whirt."

WASHINGTON—THE CAPITOL.

Washington was built, or rather planned, by the American Government, in the expectation of its becoming the greatest and most splendid metropolis in the formed by two branches of the Potowmac. The original plan was almost unrivalled for regularity and beauty, forming a parallelogram of four miles by two-and-a-half; but it has only been taken up at a number of detached points, and the city consists merely of straggling clusters, placed at an inconvenient distance from each other. In the Capitol, or house for the assembling of Congress (shown in the centre of the view), no cost has been spared to produce the utmost possible magnificence: nine hundred marble columns have been imported, and the talents of four artists have been employed upon it.

NOOKS AND CORNERS OF OLD ENGLAND.

BIRTHPLACE OF ADDISON.

Milston, the birth-place of Addison, is a retired village, containing only 107 inhabitants, and is distant a few miles from the town of Amesbury, in Wiltshire. The Essayist's father, who was Dean of Lichfield, was also Rector of the parish, and here, in the Rectory-house, on the 1st of May, 1672, the celebrated author of "The Spectator" was born.

Our sketch represents the house in its present state of repair; but, even in the days of Addison, it must have been a very humble abode.

MILSTON CHURCH.

No tradition remains in the village respecting his early habits. An original engraved portrait is still preserved in the rectory. The church, which is close to the house, is a very ancient structure, almost entirely covered with ivy.

DESTRUCTIVE FIRE AT LYME REGIS.

On Saturday last, the sea-port town of Lyme Regis was the scene of a most extensive conflagration. The fire broke out at about half-past nine A.M., on the premises of Mr. G. Sellers, baker, residing in George's-court; some furze in an adjoining loft became ignited, and was speedily in a blaze, which quickly communicated to the stables of the George Inn, the roofs of which, being composed of thatch, were soon in a complete flame; and the dwelling-house of Mr. Sellers, the George Inn, the house of Mr. J. Channon, and the whole of the premises adjoining, were quickly burned to the ground, the inmates having scarcely time to save any of their effects. There having been no rain for nearly two months, everything was excessively dry; and the flames, aided by a fresh breeze at N.E., spread with the greatest rapidity, and quickly crossed the streets to the opposite houses, when the Victoria Inn and the adjoining premises fell a prey to the flames, the whole of the furniture and stock being entirely consumed. Nothing could now arrest the progress of the flames. Both sides of Coombe-street being on fire, the greatest consternation and alarm prevailed. The scene became truly awful, as several houses caught fire at once, and women and children were seen running about the streets in a state of distraction, endeavouring to save some portion of their goods. The wind had now carried the flames to the stables of the Cups Hotel, which, being all thatched, burned with the greatest fury, and soon communicated to the dwelling-house; and the whole of the extensive premises of the principal Inn in the town were soon reduced to a heap of ruins, with barely sufficient time to save the horses and different vehicles in the yard. Meanwhile, the fire continued to proceed through Coombe-street, the houses on each side being entirely destroyed, as far as Mr. Munden's on one side, and the Crown Inn on the other—both being preserved by pulling down a house between each and the fire. The Pilot-boat Inn had by this time caught fire, and, the flames spreading rapidly, was soon burnt down, together with the whole of the adjoining houses on the left hand and also behind, with the salt and coal cellars of Messrs. Prosser. The Custom House next followed, being levelled with the ground; but all the books and papers belonging thereto were fortunately preserved. In spite of the exertions of the firemen, and the plentiful supply of water to the engines, the fire proceeded up the street; and the Commercial Reading-rooms, the houses of Mr. Bowring, Captain Urquhart, Mrs. Fox, Mrs. Sellers, Mr. Hooks, Mr. Landrays, the Conservative Reading-room, the extensive premises of Mr. J. Sellers, maltster and brewer, the New Inn, with the buildings behind, were all burned to the ground. The only house not wholly burnt is that of Mr. Templeman, which is only partially destroyed; whilst the shambles opposite are entirely unroofed, and the clock, with the spire and vane, totally demolished. In the afternoon, the wind gradually subsided, and the progress of the flames was fortunately arrested. The amount of damage is immense. The lower part of the town presents a scene of destruction and desolation never witnessed since the memorable fire of Nov. 5, 1803, when the whole of Mill-green was destroyed. About forty houses have now been burned down, amongst which is the head inn, and five public houses. The greater part, we believe, are insured, but many have lost their all, while vast numbers have had their goods torn to pieces and lost by removing to a place of safety. Great praise is due to the officers and crews of her Majesty's cutters, Adelaide, Eagle, and Asp, which happened to be in the roads at the time, and whose exertions to stop the progress of the flames, both by assisting in pulling down the houses and at the engines, were highly meritorious, as were also those of the inspecting commander and the coast-guard.

PARLIAMENTARY PORTRAITS.—No. XVIII.

THE EARL OF WICKLOW.

The Earl of Wicklow is an Irish representative peer; he is the third Earl of the title, which was created in 1793. His lordship is a Conservative, and a general supporter of the present Government, but moderate in his opinions in politics, while in private life he has the reputation of being a good landlord, though it is to be lamented that just men of this class too often leave their estates and tenants to the exclusive management of agents, whose misconduct is visited on the principal. As a proof that in politics he takes an independent part, we may state that on more than one occasion he has shown a reluctance to back them to the full extent that a Government generally expects from its supporters. His lordship is fifty-six years of age, tall and portly in person, and partaking much of the appearance of a "gentleman farmer," with a countenance expressive of much benevolence. He does not often speak, except upon Irish questions. The family seats in Ireland are, Shilton Abbey, Wicklow; and Castle Forward, Donegal.

"MAY MEETINGS" IN EXETER HALL.

In our Journal of last week, we chronicled one of the most important of these important and interesting "gatherings" for benevolent purposes.

Exeter Hall, in the Strand, is, however, the general place of meeting; and herein are held several anniversaries during the month of May. Our engraving represents one of these impressive réunions, and it is impossible to regard so vast an assemblage gathered for a truly ennobling purpose, without acknowledging the magnitude of such proceedings in the grand scheme of human improvement.

The Great Hall is 90 feet broad, 138 in length, and 48 high, and is lighted by 18 large windows. It will hold 3000 persons with comfort, and 4000 crowded. The platform, at the east end, shown in our engraving, will accommodate 500 persons, and is fenced from the rest of the hall by a railing, within which is seated the chairman, surrounded by persons influential in convening the meeting, officers of the Society, &c. On very attractive occasions, the hall is crowded long before the proceedings commence, and ladies are to be seen at the doors early in the morning, waiting till the hour of opening.

From April to the end of May in each year, it is calculated that there are about thirty different societies which hold their annual meetings in Exeter Hall, including, under that term, both the large hall and a smaller one beneath it.

During the present month, there have been held in this noble hall, the Anniversary Meetings of the British and Foreign Bible, the Colonial Church Societies, the London City Mission, Prayer Book and Homily Society, Sunday School Union, the Jews' Society, Religious Tract Society, Church Pastoral Aid Society, Protestant Association, London Missionary Society, Female Servants' Home, Church of Scotland Missions, Home Missionary Society, Anti-Slavery Society, and Foreign Aid Society.

"D. D.," Hampton Wick.—Not at present.

"H. W. B.," Usk, Monmouthshire.—The ancient sword has no interest at the present moment.

Woodspring Priory.—We have not room.

"H. H. H.," Plymouth.—We shall be happy to engrave the Horticultural Show, if sent in time.

"A Subscriber," Galway.—We consider that we have already sufficiently illustrated the South Eastern Railway.

"J. P.," Steamford.—The expressions were used relatively, and not in the sense objected to. We agree with our correspondent, that Sunday Schools have immensely benefitted the country.

"S. M. B."—In a fortnight.

"T. G.," Ballymena.—We must decline the suggestion, as we do not wish to foment disputes in religious communities.

"W. C.," Wakefield.—We are not responsible for any advertisement inserted in our journal, and we by no means recommend "the Austrian Loan."

"R. S. B."—The law relative to sending letters by any other means than the post is the same as before the reduction of the rates of postage.

"A. F. P." will be entitled to the large engraving.

"J. S. W.," Kidderminster.—We do not think the preferred subjects of present interest.

"Beta" is informed that the surest stepping-stone to a knowledge of the Greek language is an acquaintance with the Latin. There are, to be sure, grammars and lexicons to be had, in which the elements and meanings are explained in our vernacular—such as Bell's, &c.; but, even with a smattering of Latin on the part of the student, we should recommend Wettenhal's as the most concise and at the same time most comprehensive

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, MAY 18, 1844.

THE battle between capital and labour is suspended at present by the victory of the employing interest. How that victory has been obtained, and at what price, we have stated elsewhere; what its consequences will be, cannot be so readily stated. First there will be a great and deep disappointment on the part of those who hailed the one gleam of the sunshine of hope, the vanishing of which will leave them in greater darkness than before. Disappointment is closely followed by dissatisfaction, and should employment slacken, and any considerable numbers be thrown out of work, that dissatisfaction may be expressed in a manner to be deeply deplored. Such a forced cessation of labour may happen; it has occurred frequently, and its probability is one of the facts that seems to us to make some attempt to regulate the excess of labour advisable and practicable. At present, our system compels periods of excessive, grinding, unceasing toil, followed by periods of total idleness, or rather of enforced cessation from labour; for idleness is a fault that cannot be charged against the population of England as a body. Is there not something unreasoning in these alternations, both in extremes, and both injurious to health, morals, and happiness? But the State, which only attends to what alarms it, passes over unnoticed all the abuses of the excess of toil, and when want and hunger, to the very verge of famine, is driving the poor and ignorant sufferers into some instinctive movement that may make their distresses known, the only remedy thought of by the ruling powers is to despatch troops into what are called the "disturbed districts." Why are they disturbed? Because the amount of work that might have subsisted a mass of men over a year has been compressed into half the time; and, as much of the produce is ordered on speculation, if there is a suspension of demand, there follow all the evils of gluts, warehouses full of goods, with no one to buy; streets of factories, with none to work them; and towns full of hungry thousands, with no one to feed them, and quite unable to feed themselves. We are convinced that a wiser distribution of labour would remedy many evils, and prevent more; it is the same, to some extent, with capital; it is in itself an advantage for any country to possess it in abundance, but if distributed so unequally as to make a few inordinately rich, and to leave the many miserably poor, it causes terrible evils. We fear there is an approach to this state of things among ourselves. We are not blind to the difficulties of a restrictive interference with labour as a general policy; we will grant at once that it would be impossible. But the impossibility of effecting all that could be wished, should not prevent us from attempting what is plainly possible; still less should it prevent an interference on behalf of those who are weak and defenceless, and who are driven by the competition for life to undergo an amount of toil that renders life itself far from a blessing;—all that lies between the cradle and the coffin being little more than a dreary monotony, which, if it has any variation at all, it is only in the change from bad to worse, for the cessation from work exposes them to a fate worse than the hardest toil they can be called on to endure.

THE Court of Chancery, we need not inform the reader, is a place which no one goes into who can keep out of it, and out of which no one can come who has once got in. Its forms of procedure have every fault that can disgrace a system, meant for the administration of justice; the Chancellor and his three assistants may stand for the Law and its Three Vices—Expence, Delay, and Uncertainty. So often has it been exposed and satirized that any abuse of it is trite and stale; the terms of reproach have been exhausted. That such a system should be changed and reformed was a necessity; but so slow is progress where the law is concerned, that for any alteration to be proposed and carried was a surprise; and now that the change has come to be examined it is discovered that the alteration is a calamity. The sin that is mended, says the poet, is but patched with virtue. But the sin of the Court of Chancery has been patched without being mended at all, and no kind of virtue has been used in the process. As to making the public understand the nature of the changes that have been made, it would be utterly impossible; the secret machinery of the Court of Chancery is altogether a mystery; we should be inclined to call it a mystery of iniquity, understood only by the initiated, who take care that it shall be understood by nobody else; and we have observed so much contradiction among those whom we must suppose to be well informed, that we have sometimes been disposed to think they do not clearly understand it themselves, except in one particular—that of costs—on which the general agreement is perfect, and the understanding very clear indeed. All the proceedings of the Chancery that are visible, the sittings of the Lord Chancellor, the pleading of Counsel, and the reported decisions, are but a small part of what is necessary to the proper lengthening out of a Chancery suit. Behind all these, and beyond them in the potentiality of delay, is the frightful army of Masters and Clerks, whose name is Legion, and whose business is—fee taking. There are the Clerk of the Enrolments, Controllers of the Hanaper, Riding Clerk, Six Clerks, Sworn Clerks, Waiting Clerks, Agents, or Record Keepers in the Court of Chancery, and others, as the advertisements say, too numerous to mention. The business of the Six Clerks, says a good authority, being to do nothing, about two hundred years ago it was thought expedient to appoint the Sworn Clerks, about sixty in number, to help them do it. The same authority, the Times, in a very able article, thus continues the description:—"But these duties" (doing nothing) "being found too onerous, a new class of officials, called Agents, were invented, upon whom the principal burden was thenceforth to fall. For these services a grateful public, or rather that unhappy part of it which comes to be punnelled in Chancery, rewarded them with an aggregate income of £77,000 per annum. The offices, as may be supposed, were too good things to be easily parted with; and became, by a very ordinary law of nature, hereditary and saleable. One such place has before now fetched £27,000; £15,000 has been given for part only of another; and a Mr. Wainwright's family have been in possession of a third, from father to son, since the time of the Commonwealth. And all this out of the pockets of the public."

Lord Lyndhurst has, in the character of a Law Reformer, introduced a change that is certainly not an improvement. The compensation that a too careless Parliament has awarded at the request of the too clever Chancellor, is so enormous that it represents a gross total of one million sterling! The clerks of the Six Clerks have compensations of various amounts, some as high as £7000 a year, to be continued for their lives, with a reversion of £2500 to their heirs and executors, after their deaths. Never were sinecures that were of themselves an abuse so considerately treated, and we may now see why it was that the holders of them submitted so quietly to the change. We hope never again to see Law Reform trusted to the hands of lawyers themselves; the present essay has produced as its result one of the most gigantic and shameless pieces of jobbing ever perpetrated. But it is not those who are to profit by it who are to blame. That such an act should have passed through Parliament, without any exposure of its character, is disgraceful to that assembly. The only excuse is that it was a smuggled measure, passed with indecent indecent haste, at a period of the session when most of the members of the legal profession were on circuit, some of whom might have penetrated the obscurity of the legal phraseology, and exposed the mischief that lurked in the clauses introduced at the eleventh hour, and read and passed nobody knows how or when. It is by a lawyer—Mr. Watson, the member for Kinsale—that the infamous job is exposed now; great is the pity that his good exertions, like most good advice, came too late to be of any utility. Had he made his forcible statement last session, and at the time the bill was pending, it might have prevented much mischief. Had the expense fallen on the Consolidated Fund, and had the compensation to these legal incumbrances been asked for out of the public purse, we hope and believe that the Treasury, with Sir. R. Peel at its head, would not have allowed such extravagance of demand. But the money comes from the pockets of the suitors in Chancery alone, and they were left to the tender mercies of the court, which has treated them much as the wolf does the flock,—devoured them. Who are the suitors? and who represent them? Some are walking the streets, poor and needy, and suffering under the irritation of knowing that they are the possessors of competence, in many cases of wealth, locked up from them "in Chancery;" and year by year evaporating in fees and costs, for the benefit of whole generations of legal sinecurists. Some are in mad-houses, the balance of their minds destroyed by the delays and complications of a judicial system, suited only to the limited properties and simple transactions of a feudal age; but totally unfit to deal with the intricacies of property in a great commercial country. Others, more happy than these, are in their graves,—beyond the reach of the Law and those who thrive by it; but whose suits still drag on from year to year, an heir-loom for generations—an hereditary vexation to many successors—though all who were interested in it when commenced have been for half a century mingled with the dust! Such things as these, and more, and worse, are continued and permitted by Englishmen in the nineteenth century! Now and then some job, of an especially scandalous kind, attracts attention by its enormity—as in the present instance—and it is well that it should be exposed: but far better would it be to prevent them. What has been done, we fear could not be undone; and the exertions of Mr. Watson and others now, remind us of the ill-timed watchfulness that locks the stable-door only when the steed has been "conveyed" beyond chance of "recovery."

OUR workhouse system is evidently intended not only to be as much like that of the prison as possible, but to be used as the feeder of these abodes of crime. The cruelty, or the carelessness which amounts to cruelty, of the workhouse officials is so gross, that no case ought to be passed over in silence. At the present Middlesex Sessions the following case occurred:—

Alfred Matthews pleaded guilty to a charge of stealing a piece of pork, the property of John Marshall. After his plea had been recorded, the prisoner handed in a paper, which the chairman, on perusal, stated, if true, showed that the case of the prisoner was one of the most heart-rending description. From his statement it appeared that when before the committing magistrate on the above charge, he stated that distress had driven him to the commission of the offence, and that having previously applied for parochial relief, he was sent into the stone-yard, and received some bread, with an intimation that he must not apply to them again. In reply to questions from the Court, the prisoner said he could not obtain more than sixpence to eightpence a day by breaking stones—that being a kind of work to which he had never been subjected—that he had a wife and three children to support—that he belonged to the parish of Hackney, and that it was from the officers of that parish he had received the treatment he complained of.

The starving man asks for bread, and the Bumbles of office give him literally a stone, with an injunction to break it up as the price of his relief. This is neither Charity nor Christianity: "the stone-yard" is not the place to send starving men to. That it is not, is proved by the fact, that the hunger-driven man steals the food that he can get neither by labour nor by law, and becomes the inmate of a prison. The community certainly does not pay rates to propagate crime, but those who manage the funds are so very careful of their trust, that they part with it as reluctantly as if every penny was a drop of their own blood. We do not believe that society expects such exceeding rigour at their hands. We consider the "parochial authorities" of Hackney morally accountable for the theft committed, in the desperation of famine, by Alfred Matthews, and the week's imprisonment and hard labour to which he is sentenced would be a just punishment to them. And examples of this harshness do not, unfortunately, come alone. At the same Sessions—

Another still more distressing case was afterwards tried, in which an old man, aged sixty-four, named John Goodwin, was convicted of stealing a knife, value one shilling, and who had been subjected to sum lar treatment by the officers of the Lambeth Union, and who, having been turned out of the workhouse, wandered about from day to day in search of employment, which he was unable to obtain, and at length returned to the town, at length, in a fit of desperation, committed the offence of which he was convicted. He was sentenced to a month's imprisonment, the Chairman promising to procure his re-admission to Lambeth workhouse when the present sentence had expired.

We think that Lambeth may pair off with Hackney: it is hard to say which of the two has exhibited the most inhumanity.

THE COURT AND HAUT TON.

SUNDAY.—Her Majesty and Prince Albert, the Ladies and Gentlemen of the Royal suite and the household, attended Divine Service in the Chapel Royal, Buckingham Palace. The Queen held a Court on Saturday at which the Marquis de Velmas, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary from Her Majesty the Queen of Spain, had an audience of her Majesty.

MONDAY.—The Queen and Prince Albert walked in the Royal gardens of Buckingham Palace. His Royal Highness Prince Albert visited the Artillery Ground, Finsbury, during the morning. Their Royal Highnesses the Prince of Wales, the Princess Royal, and the Princess Alice, were taken their usual daily airings in the Royal gardens. The Royal dinner party at Buckingham Palace, on Monday evening, included his Excellency le Marquis de Velsma, the Archbishop of Canterbury and Mrs. Howley, the Duke and Duchess of Bedford, the Marquis of Cholmondeley, the Earl of Aberdeen, Lord and Lady Dalmeny, Lord and Lady Lyttelton, and the Right Honourable Sir Henry and Lady Emily Hardinge.

TUESDAY.—The Queen and Prince Albert left Buckingham Palace at half-past three o'clock in the afternoon in a carriage and four, escorted by a party of Lancers for Claremont. Their Royal Highnesses the Prince of Wales and the Princess Royal followed in another carriage and four. The royal party arrived at Claremont shortly before five o'clock.

WEDNESDAY.—Her Majesty, Prince Albert, and the Royal Family took their usual exercise in the delightful grounds of Claremont.

HER ROYAL HIGHNESS THE DUCHESS OF GLOUCESTER.—We are gratified to announce the gradually improving health of her Royal Highness after her recent accident, which happily was not attended by any very serious consequences. On Tuesday week, the 30th ult., her Royal Highness, as was her almost daily practice, went to Kensington to visit the Princess Sophia, and in coming out to her carriage was going through the hall, when her Royal Highness caught her foot in a mesh in the oilcloth and fell heavily on the ground, sustaining some very severe contusions on the face, and also on one of her arms, besides being much shaken by the fall.

THURSDAY.—The Queen and Prince Albert, accompanied by the Princess Royal, arrived in town at twenty minutes before six on Thursday afternoon, escorted by a party of Lancers, from Claremont. The Prince of Wales was in the next royal carriage; and the Countess of Mount Edgcumbe, Col. Arbuthnot, and Col. Wylde, followed in another. Sir Robert and Lady Gardiner had the honour of dining with her Majesty, at Claremont, on Wednesday. The Queen Dowager dined with divine service in the morning at the Royal Chapel, St. James's. The Duke of Cambridge left town, for the Royal Military College at Sandhurst, by the South Western Railway. The Duchess of Cambridge, attended by Baroness Ahlefeldt, took an airing, for residence at Kew, in an open barouche. The Duchess returned in the evening to Cambridge House.

Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent and the Prince de Leuingen left Pontainebleau on Thursday morning for Switzerland.

A Cabinet Council was held at the Foreign Office on Thursday at two o'clock. All the ministers (except Lord Stanley) were present.

The Duke of Wellington intends to give a grand ball at Apsley House at the close of the ensuing week. We have reason to believe Friday will be appointed.

CHURCH, UNIVERSITIES, &c.

On Tuesday week the Lord Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol instituted the Rev. W. L. Darell, M.A., to the rectory of Fretherne, in the county and diocese of Gloucester, vacant by the resignation of the Rev. R. G. Christie. On Wednesday the Rev. George Sweet Escott, M.A., was instituted to the vicarage of Barnwood, in the county and diocese of Gloucester, vacant by the cession of the Rev. C. F. B. Wood.

The Bishop of Chester has nominated Richard Wall, B.A. (twenty-fourth wrangler, 1844), to the Vice Principalship of the Training College, Chester.

OXFORD, MAY 15.—Mr. Macmullar again applied for his Degree, and was again refused by the Vice-Chancellor. It is expected that the question relative to this gentleman's Degree will cause a great contention between the two parties in the University. The Tractarians, it is said, are the strongest in numbers, and when the question is brought regularly before convocation, they will muster almost to a man to support Mr. Macmullar. In a Congregation holden this morning, the following Degrees were conferred:—Bachelor of Divinity: Rev. T. Nicholl, Worcester College. Masters of Arts: Matthew Hale Estcourt, Exeter College; James Carden, Merton College; Rev. Henry Mitchell, Lincoln College; Rev. Henry Mac Gil, Brasenose College. Bachelor of Arts: Thomas C. Garth, Christchurch. Grand Compounders: James T. Barlow, Christchurch; Frederick Bagot, Christchurch; John S. Eaton, Worcester College; John Wadham, Wadham College; George A. Alston, Wadham College; George F. Bower, Scholar of Trinity College; Monier Williams, University College; George F. Buller, Exeter College; Edward F. Perceval, Brasenose College; Robert Vaughton, New Inn Hall.

On Monday, the Lord Bishop of Chester consecrated the new church at Red bank, in the parish of Broughton, Manchester, in the presence of the Hon. and Very Rev. the Dean, and the other clergy of Manchester and its neighbourhood. This church is one of the twelve intended to be completed by the Manchester and Eccles Church Building Society, and is capable of seating from eight hundred to nine hundred persons; it consists of a nave, aisles, and chancel, has a chorister's, an open roof, and is without side galleries, and, as a whole, presents no bad specimen of modern church architecture in the early English style. Mr. Mosely, the county surveyor of Middlesex, was the architect employed in the erection.

The Lord Bishop of Ripon intends holding the triennial visitation of his diocese in September next.

The Lord Bishop of Gloucester will hold the triennial visitation of his diocese in August.

The Archdeacon of Craven intends commencing his visitation at Leeds on Monday, June 3. The following are his subsequent arrangements: Skipton, June 5; Halifax, June 6; Wakefield, June 7.

The Archdeacon of York intends holding a visitation in the diocese according to the following arrangement:—York, June 17; Pontefract, June 18; Doncaster, June 19; Rotherham, June 21.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

On Wednesday evening the Lord Mayor entertained her Majesty's Ministers, and several members of both houses of Parliament, at dinner, in the Egyptian Hall, at the Mansion-House. Among the guests, who were very numerous, we observed the Lord Chancellor, Lord Wharncliffe, the Duke of Buccleuch, the Earl of Lincoln, Earl Delawarr, Earl of Devon, Earl of Shaftesbury, Earl of Jersey, Earl Jermyn, Lord S. Somerset, Viscount Barrington, Lord Canning, Lord Ashley, Lord Eliot, the Bishop of Llandaff, Sir Robert Peel, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Lord Monteagle, Sirs G. Murray, James Graham, E. Knatchbull, Mr. E. Gladstone, Sir J. Nicholl, Captain Gordon, &c. All the leading members of the Corporation were also present.

BANK OF ENGLAND.—An adjourned meeting of the Proprietors of the corporation was held in the court-room on Monday, to take into consideration important matters relative to the corporation, especially as respects the proposed plans for the renewal of the charter. At the usual hour the Governor, the Deputy Governor, and most of the Directors, entered the court-room. The Governor, having stated the objects of the meeting, read the resolution which it was requested that the Proprietors should accede to. It was as follows:—"That this court concur in the recommendation of the Court of Directors to accede to the proposal of her Majesty's Government for the renewal of the privileges of the Bank, provided the general regulations referred to in the letters of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and proposed to Parliament, be adopted." Mr. Fielder moved the following amendment:—"That the Court of Bank Proprietors, taking into consideration the risk and charges attending the Bank business, as it relates to the issuing and managing department, cannot accede to the payment of £180,000, for which the Bank Proprietors will not receive any adequate remuneration." Mr. Young seconded the amendment. Another amendment was proposed by Mr. Weedling, and a third by Mr. Thompson, on which a long and stormy discussion ensued. The original motion, however, was ultimately carried by a large majority, there being only three dissentients.

SOMERSETSHIRE SOCIETY.—On Thursday, the 34th anniversary festival of this Society was celebrated at the Freemasons' Tavern, Aldersgate-street, Montague Gore, Esq., M.P., in the Chair. The usual loyal and national toasts having been drunk, the Chairman, in a neat address, proposed the "Somersetshire Society," which was received with cheers. Mr. Adlam, the Secretary, then submitted the Report of the Society, which was instituted for apprenticing the children of Somersetshire parents resident in London, and to assist them afterwards to commence business. Since the formation of the Society, hundreds were recipients of its bounty, and it continued to receive the most flattering support.

ROYAL SOCIETY FOR THE PREVENTION OF CRUELTY TO ANIMALS.—On Thursday the annual meeting of the Royal Society for the Prevent on of Cruelty to Animals was held in the Hanover-square Rooms, which were completely crowded by a fashionable and select company. Lord Viscount Sandon, M.P. for Liverpool, took the chair. On opening the meeting he observed that it was remarked upon the benefits of the Society, in awakening the most humane feelings of the human mind, and also touched upon the laudable exertions engendered in the rewards so judged by the Society to those who carried out the humane intentions. The Rev. Henry Travers, the secretary, then read the report, which was extremely lengthy, and detailed the operations of the Society during the past year, giving a description of the various vulgar customs, such as bull baiting, &c., which had been put down by the Society, or by their means and representations had been abandoned. More particularly the subject of pony and horse-driving in matches, was touched on; and the Society declared its intention of punishing to its utmost power the cruelty practised in matches of the description. It expressed itself indebted to the police-magistrates of the Metropolis for their kindness in rendering assistance to the Society. Rev. R. Burgess, Mr. Colam, and other speakers, addressed the meeting, in support of resolutions carrying out the plea that, as all cruelty tended to brutalise the human mind, it was a most Christian and humane work to suppress it. Mr. Mackinnon, M.P., and Mr. Symington, occupied the chair at the latter part of the proceedings, Lord Stanley being obliged to leave, and received a vote of thanks at the conclusion of the meeting.

RACING AND HUNTING.—On Thursday the children of the several Charities in and around the metropolis beat according to custom the bounds of each parish. At Deptford and Greenwich the bounds between them had to be beat by a person in a boat, who crossed the river to perform the two districts, which, until within these few years, was done by swimming across it.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

CHATHAM.—Detachments from the following regiments—68th, 97th, 31st, 96th, and 80th, left this garrison on Tuesday morning, for Gravesend, when they embarked from the Custom-house Quay on board the Peninsular Steamships for Van Dieman's Land. The 68th, including the band and head-quarters, furnish 146 rank and file, with 10 sergeants, under the command of Major Dundas Bridge, with Capt. Nugent, of the same corps. 13 women and 27 children belonging to the regiment, proceed with them. The provisional battalion furnishes for embarkation by the same ship 37 men from the 97th, 33 men from the 31st, 21 men from the 96th, and 46 men from the 80th. The whole of these troops (3.6 men) were inspected by Sir Thomas Willshire, Bart., K.C.B., on Saturday last. Lieutenant-Colonel Robert Henry Wynyard, who was to have embarked with the above, does not go, having received an appointment in the 85th regiment as expected to be either the 61st, now stationed at Limerick, or the 72d, now at Fermoy. The general opinion, however, is, that it will be the 61st Regiment, as it has been generally noticed that the 61st has always followed the 85th Regiment. The trial of Sergeant-Major Nulance, of the 12th Lancers, still continues. The prisoner made a lengthened defence on Saturday, and several witnesses were examined on his behalf, and from their evidence it is understood that he has been committed somewhere. The greatest interest prevails throughout the garrison to know the result.

We understand that Captain Robert Blucher Wood, of the 10th Royal Hussars—now private secretary to Sir Henry Hardinge—accompanies that excellent and distinguished officer in the same capacity to India. Captain A. W. F. Somerset, of the Coldstream Guards (son of Lieutenant-General Lord Fitzroy Somerset) military secretary to Lord Ellenborough, is to occupy the same post on Sir Henry's personal staff as Governor-General of India.

THE RATTLESNAKE.—A letter from Aden, in the Indian navy, received on Saturday, contains the following passage:—"I have been employed, together with the captain, surgeon, and another midshipman of late Memnon, on the wreck of our old ship. We have been everything by turns nearly—fishermen—all the copper-boilers, guns, anchors, cables, and many parts of the machinery. We left this (Aden) in October last, in the Company's brig Palmyras, and only returned a week since." The letter is dated Aden, April 4, 1844.

Sir George Seymour has received his commission appointing him Commander-in-Chief in the Pacific

It is generally believed that Admiral Lye will succeed to the command in Ireland, vacant by the elevation of Rear-Admiral Bowles to the Admiralty Board.

Commander Robert Trotter, on the retired list, has been appointed Commander of the Kent.

The Nautilus transport, Lieutenant W. C. Saunders agent, arrived at Spithead on Friday evening from Malta and Gibraltar. She has brought home condemned ordnance stores, and 230 invalided soldiers from the different regiments stationed in the Mediterranean and Gibraltar. She has had a long tedious passage home. She sailed for the river on Monday.

The Rattlesnake troop ship, steamer Commander Brown, arrived at Portsmouth on Sunday evening, from Hong Kong, touching on her way home at the Cape, St. Helena, and Ascension. She has had altogether a long passage; she left the Cape on the 8th of March, at which time the Winchester, 50, Captain C. Eden, with the flag of Rear-Admiral Josiah Percy (about to sail on a cruise,) and the Thunderbolt steamer, Commander George A. Broke, were lying there. She left St. Helena the 17th of March. When the different regiments left Hong Kong, she had 230 invalids on board, out of which number, we are sorry to say, she has lost from deaths on board 65 persons, the dysentery having broken out there, raged with extreme violence. Captain Geary, and six men of the Royal Artillery, and many of the Royal Marines are among the persons carried off, and she has still many sick on board. The Echo steamer went off to her on Monday for the purpose of bringing on shore to the hospital the bad cases, which we understand amount to above 40 persons. The rest of the supernumeraries will be received on board the flag ship. The Rattlesnake has brought home the following officers:—Lieutenant Daly, R.N., late of the Pelican; Lieutenant P. Prest, R.N.; Mr. Carpenter, surgeon, R.N.; and Messrs. Allen and Rodgers, assistant surgeons. Having been nearly five years in commission, she will come in harbour and be paid off.

The Mirror, freight-ship, arrived at Portsmouth on Monday from Woolwich, with the new tubular boilers for the Victoria and Albert. Her deck had to be opened to receive them into her hold.

Ninety-four Marines from the Portsmouth division, with Lieutenants Elliott and De Courey, embarked on board the Collingwood, on Saturday last, at that place. Captain Buchanan and Lieutenant Magin, with 20 men from the Wool wich division, joined, which completed her complement. She has entered some good seamen, and has commenced rigging in dock.

The Sydenham steam vessel, Lieutenant Commander Mapleton, left Woolwich at nine o'clock A.M. on Sunday for Portsmouth, with the pursers appointed, except Lieutenant-General Lord Bloomfield, G.C.B. and G.C.H., and Captain Bloomfield, Royal Horse Artillery, who have deferred their contemplated visit to their honourable relative at the Court of St. Petersburgh for the present.

The 10th Hussars having within the past week received the route for Dundalk, it is stated in military circles that Lord Cardigan will upon the Director-General (Wyndham), and requested permission for the head quarters to be permitted to remain in Dublin, but General Wyndham replied that he saw no reason why any deviation should be made from the ordinary course being pursued with the 11th Hussars. It is also understood that they will be one of the first to be withdrawn from Ireland.

Mr. W. Peel, son of the Premier, has been appointed to the Winchester. The Prometheus has been commissioned by Commander J. Hay.

Lieut. J. Compton has been appointed additional to the St. Vincent.

THE ANNUAL MEETING OF THE BRITISH AND FOREIGN ANTI-SLAVERY SOCIETY.

This meeting, held yesterday (Friday), in Exeter-hall, was attended by an immense concourse of people, not less than four thousand persons crowding the hall at an early hour. The main attraction, however, was the expectation of hearing Lord Brougham speak, it having been announced that his lordship would take the chair. At the appointed hour (eleven o'clock), the chair was taken by Mr. Samuel Gurney, and an apology for Lord Brougham's absence, in the shape of an extract from a letter was read to the meeting, stating that his lordship was unable to attend, owing to the continuation of the Privy Council, which rendered it impossible for the Judges to get through the work, so that they were obliged to call in the aid of a professional man; which announcement was received with mingled laughter and hisses.

Mr. Gurney then addressed the meeting; the secretary read the report and a letter from Thomas Clarkson; and several of the Anti-Slavery advocates, amongst whom was Mr. G. Thompson, spoke to the question. A great many persons left the hall when it was found that Lord Brougham did not propose attending. We noticed upon the platform the Bishop of Norwich and Mr. O'Connell.

WHITBY.—SHIP LAUNCH.—On Saturday last a very large concourse of people assembled to witness the launch of a splendid ship, from the building-yard of Henry Barrick, Esq., west-side. This noble vessel entered her destined element in fine style, about five o'clock, amid the cheers of hundreds of spectators. She was named the "Excalibur," and measures 600 tons N.M. and 860, O.M. This vessel is of superior build, and is classed 12 years, A. 1, at Lloyd's, which, we believe, is the first 12 years ship that has been built in Whitby.

THE BATTERSEA MURDER.

On Saturday Dalmas was placed at the bar before Mr. Clive James (Cook, 11, Davers-street, Chelsea, coal-porter, deposed that on the night of the murder he saw a man running down Duke-street, at a distance of about 60 yards from the Cut, Waterloo-bridge-road, on Sunday night, and he ran after him, and overtook him at the corner of Cornish-lane, and followed to see what it was. The man then returned, and said that "a woman had cut her throat on Battersea-bridge." The man came along the path on which witness was standing. As soon as he had uttered these words he passed on. He wore a dark frock coat, and had his hat over his eyes a good deal. Informed a man named Wells of what he had been told, and they went together to the toll-house. Thought he should know the man again if he saw him.

The prisoner was then placed in the body of the court with other persons, and identified by the witness as the man who had told him that there was a woman on the bridge who had cut her throat. Had not seen the prisoner before this, and did not know him by sight previously to the occasion alluded to.

Thomas Hall, the toll-collector of Battersea-bridge, was called, and deposed to the circumstances which have been several times reported, attending the death of the woman. When she first came up she said, "See how some one has been abusing me on the bridge; support me, support me." She almost immediately fell from weakness, and shortly afterwards died at the Swan, to which she had been removed. Had seen deceased and prisoner's youngest daughter go over the bridge together that morning.

Eliza Long, of Ford's Buildings, Batterses, was going to Chelsea on 29th April, and was turning out of the Batterses Foly, when she heard a cry of "Police!" and saw a woman there fall down. She stopped quite scramble. The police-man asked her who she was, and she did not appear to understand him. He then said, "Did Dalmas do it?" and she said, "Yes, yes," very faintly.

Police constable Frederick Lanagan, 36 V, called. His evidence was read over to him, and he deposed to its correctness. The portion of his testimony relating to the dying declaration of the deceased, that "Dalmas had cut her throat, and that no one else was present," was most distinct.

Augusta Dalmas identified several letters as being in the hand-writing of the prisoner (her father).

Mr. Wm. Gosling, the landlord of the Swan, called. Deposition read over. He also had heard the dying declaration of the woman that Dalmas had cut her throat.

Superintendent Bicknell proved having found in a drawer at the house of the deceased letters which he now produced, from November last up to the time of the murder.

In one of these letters the prisoner, after speaking of an attempt on the part of deceased's sister to alienate her affections from him, said that if he thought it should succeed, he feared it would lead to a fatal event. These letters were couched in terms of the strongest affection. He called deceased "his beloved Sarah," and "wife," and said, "would to God you loved me as I do you." In some of them he described himself as her "affectionate husband

The prisoner was then again remanded at half-past one o'clock until Tuesday. On Tuesday the prisoner Dalmas was again examined before Mr. Clive, at the Wandsworth police-court. There was nothing whatever new in the evidence, most of it being merely repetitions of what has already appeared in print. At close the prisoner said he should reserve his defence, and was committed to Newgate for trial.

POSTSCRIPT.

The Duchess of Kent arrived at Geneva on Sunday, and took up her abode at the Hotel de l'Ecu de Geneva, where apartments had been prepared for her.

A Cabinet Council was held on Thursday afternoon, at two, at the Foreign-office. It was attended by Sir R. Peel, the Duke of Wellington, Lord Chancellor, Lord Wharncliffe, Duke of Buccleuch, Earl of Aberdeen, Sir J. Graham, Chancellor of the Exchequer, Earl of Haddington, Earl of Ripon, Mr. Gladstone, and Sir E. Knatchbull. The Council sat two hours and a half.

A deputation of private country bankers, consisting of Mr. Plumptre, M.P. (Kent), Mr. Rodwell (Suffolk), the Hon. A. L. Melville (Lincoln), Mr. Veasey (Huntingdon), Mr. Spooner (Birmingham), Mr. Tweedy (Cornwall), and Mr. Birkbeck (York), had an interview with Sir R. Peel, on Thursday, in Downing-street. Mr. Murphy, the Mexican Minister, transacted business, on the same day, at the Foreign Office.

SALE OF MR. HANNAN'S PICTURES.—Messrs. Christie and Manson's auction rooms were yesterday (Friday) literally thronged with noblemen and gentlemen, attracted by the sale of the very celebrated collection of pictures late the property of Mr. Jeremiah Harman, deceased. The Duke of Cleveland, Sir R. Peel, the Duchess of Sutherland, and a number of other distinguished personages visited the rooms during the morning, and at one time there could not have been less than thirty peers present. The catalogue for the day enumerated only about fifty subjects, but the amount realised by these, which are by far the least valuable in the collection, was £9771 5s. One subject, "The Elevation of the Cross," by Rubens, was bought by Mr. Holford, of Piccadilly, for 750 guineas. "A Sea Piece," by Ludolph Backhuysen, realised 515 guineas, being purchased by Mr. Farrer, of Wardour-street. "A View in the Appennies," by Salvator Rosa, was knocked down, after a spirited competition, for 570 guineas. A Cuyp sold for 400 guineas; "Portrait of a Rabbi," by Rembrandt, for 410 guineas; and other subjects at proportionately high prices.

THE CALEDONIAN ASYLUM.—Yesterday the twenty-seventh anniversary of this Asylum was celebrated in a very gratifying manner, by the ceremony of laying the first stone of an addition to the present building, which enables the charity to extend its benevolence to the girls of Scottish parents as well as boys. For the last few years the Directors have contemplated this extension of the charity, but having no funds available for the purpose, they were compelled to postpone it. In the course of last year, however, the munificence of Mr. Matheson, M.P. (Ashburton), who subscribed £1000 towards the expense of enlarging the building, and the subscriptions of friends of the charity, have enabled the Directors to carry out their intentions. The ceremony of laying the foundation-stone of the girls' school, at the Asylum, Copenhagen-fields, was performed by the Earl of Zetland, accompanied by Masonic forms. The Highland Society attended on the occasion. The President, his Grace the Duke of Buccleuch, and the Directors and Governors of the Charity, were also present.

BENEVOLENT SAILORS' ASSOCIATION.—SAILORS' HOME AND LONDON EPISCOPAL FLOATING CHURCH SOCIETY.—Yesterday the annual meeting of the subscribers, &c., to the above charities was held at the Hanover-square Rooms. At twelve o'clock the chair was taken by Lord Radstock. After some introductory remarks from the noble chairman, apologising for the absence of Sir Robert Stopford, the secretary read the reports for the past year, from which it appeared that the total number who had passed through the institution during the year amounted to 2433, making the total, since the commencement, 22 935, for the Asylum; and with reference to the Sailors' Home, it appeared that the total number of sailors who resided in the establishment during the year had been 3370, the average being 138 daily. The total since the commencement was 15,159. It appeared that the total receipts were, including subscriptions, &c., £6941; there being, deducting the expenditure, a balance of £870. After some very appropriate remarks, the reports having been agreed to, the meeting was dissolved.

FOREIGN AID SOCIETY.—Yesterday the annual meeting of the members of this society was held in the lower room, Exeter Hall. The Marquis of Cholmondeley presided, and was supported by several clergymen and gentlemen. From the reports read, it appeared that the operations of the committee had extended to considerable success to various parts of Europe, Africa, Asia Minor, &c. Some very large subscriptions having been entered, and the usual reports read, the meeting was dissolved.

ROYAL MASONIC BENEVOLENT ANNUITY FUND.—Yesterday, the second Annual Meeting of this beneficent society, for granting annuities to Aged, Poor, and Infirm Freemasons, was held in the Freemason's Hall, Great Queen-street, to receive the Annual Report, and elect the annuitants to receive the bounty of the charity. The Right Hon. the Earl of Zetland in the Chair, as Grand Master of all England, and a large number of members attended. The Report stated, that out of fifteen annuitants elected in 1843, one having died, fourteen only of the number continued on the fund at an annual aggregate payment of £220. The Committee had approved of no less than forty candidates, one of whom was since dead, but the funds would not allow of more than twelve becoming annuitants. The balance of money in hand last a year was stated to be £237 1s. 2d. The dividends had amounted to £52 8s. 8d. The amount of donations and annual subscriptions from that date to the 16th of April was £485, and since then £181 11s. had been received. The annual life payments, by grand lodges and grand chapters, had amounted to £435. Total receipts, £1351 11s. 10d. The expenses, including payments to annuitants, £305, and £250 for the purchase of £400 Three per Cent. Consols. Total charges, £879. Leaving a balance of £452 7s. 2d. in the hands of the Treasurer. Twelve recipients of the Fund's bounty being chosen, the meeting closed.

FIRE AT LAMBETH.—About seven o'clock on Thursday night a fire broke out in an unfurnished house, No. 4, Markham-square, Chelsea, which was completely gutted. The damage amounts to nearly £300. The fire originated in a spark from a stove, which ignited some shavings.

FIRE AT AN OIL-CLOTH FACTORY.—About twelve o'clock on Thursday night a fire broke out in the premises belonging to Mr. Lyons, floor-cloth and table-cover manufacturer, situate in Kent-road, Kent-lane, Walworth. It originated in the boiling-house, contiguous to the frames of the table-cover department. For some time not a drop of water could be obtained from the fire-plugs in the vicinity, and the whole of the drying-house was levelled with the ground, and the contents therein consumed.

POLICE.—BOW-STREET.—THREATENING THE LIFE OF SIR ROBERT PEEL.—Yesterday great sensation was caused about two o'clock in the day, by the bringing up in custody before Mrs. Jardine a well-dressed man, about forty-five years of age, charged with threatening Sir Robert Peel the night before in Whitehall-gardens, and believed at the time to be insane. The prisoner was brought up by Inspector Stephens, of A division. It appeared that the prisoner, who is an Irishman, named William O'Toole, left his country in February last, and came to London after a female, having left the service of the Horse Guard as groom, with the highest testimonials, after years of service. He arrived in London in a state of complete destitution, and was taken in by Mrs. M'Cay, a horsehop-keeper, of Hilton-street, Chiswell-street, City, who supplied him with food and clothes. He wrote to Lord Eric, the Irish Secretary, for a situation, which he (Lordship answered in the negative, and being unable to get anything to do, his landlady said, had preyed very much upon his mind. On Thursday evening, about six o'clock, he accosted policeman A 24 by asking if Sir Robert Peel was at the House of Commons. The policeman inquired if he wished to leave anything there for him; the prisoner replied, "No, I have written, and it is of no use. I will do a deed shall astonish the world." The policeman immediately took him into custody. On his person a letter was found from Lord Eliot to himself, copies of three letters intended to be sent to Lord Eliot and Sir Robert Peel, and two knives, one a large one. The letter stated that he was starving—that he could get no work, and had thoughts of destroying himself, but another thought had taken possession of his mind He would do a deed shall astonish the world—he should change the government of countries, and gain for him notoriety. It might be unenviable notoriety; be it so. It was better to die than to grow up a useless log. His strength was wasting fast, his mind was unhinged, and he would do something to rise all. Mr. Jardine said he must be stopped from doing mischief, even though he did not intend it at the time he was taken. He ordered him to find bail—himself in £100, and two sureties in £100 each, to keep the peace for 12 months. The prisoner declared he was reckless of what became of him, and was locked up.

THE ROYAL THAMES YACHT CLUB.

Saturday last being the day appointed for the first match of the Royal Thames Yacht Club, the following yachts started for the first-class prize

Gamecock	..	..	Captain Mecarra.
Enigma	..	..	J. Wilkinson, Esq.
Phantom	..	..	A. O. Wilkinson, Esq.
Gazelle	..	..	Rutherford, Esq.
Mystery	..	..	Lord Alfred Paget.

For the second-class cup:—

Cygnet	..	..	J. J. Christian, Esq.
Sauey Jack	..	..	F. Blake, Esq.
Curlew	..	..	W. H. Rees, Esq.

The day was exceedingly fine, and, from the breeze, good sport was anticipated. Considerable judge from the Thames Police Office assembled on board the Comet steamer, hired by the Commodore and Members of the Royal Thames Yacht Club, with their friends, to view the race; and also from the crowds assembled along the piers at Greenwich, Blackwall, &c.

The yachts lay in two lines; the first-class in one, and the second in another; and all looked in exceedingly good trim. At the firing of the preparatory gun, the greatest excitement prevailed, and various were the opinions on which would take the lead. Mystery, from her previous performances, was the favourite. At length, the second gun gave the signal to make sail and start, which, after some sharp work, was accomplished—Gnome taking the lead, which Gazelle would have had but for a slight accident, the carrying away of the cleat to which the spring was made fast, and which caused her to foul Mystery, the former's bowsprit catching the latter's mainsheet. When all was clear, the contest began; Gnome maintaining her lead, closely followed by the Mystery, Phantom, Gazelle, and Enigma. Gazelle, which had been considered a dangerous outsider, now began to make play and showed she was not a boat to be despised on a wind; she shortly caught up and passed her competitors, and for some time kept a good position in the race. Many were of opinion that she would at least have had the second prize; but Gnome and Mystery again passed her. The race, for a long time, was between these three. Gazelle again weathered Mystery, and her crew, thinking she would have a long run, impudently set her large topsail, which, shortly after, with the topmast, was carried away in a puff. All chance for her was now gone; still, the little vessel stood on, calculating the chances of the breeze freshening. Unfortunately, the wind failed, and the disadvantage was felt; she, however, rounded the boat at Coal-house Point before the Enigma.

The race down was admirably contested by all, and was by far the most exciting ever witnessed. The yachts rounded Coal-house Point in the following order:—

Gnome ..	..	..	.. m.
Mystery ..	..	..	.. m.
Phantom	..	..	.. m.
Gazelle ..	..	..	2h. 46 m.
Enigma ..	..	..	2h. 49 m.

They then set their balloon jib and runners, the Gnome, unfortunately, was taken aback on one occasion in passing the Lightship, when the Mystery passed and took the lead, which she maintained to the conclusion of the race. In the meantime, Enigma came up with and passed Gazelle and Phantom. The loss of Gazelle's topmast was here greatly felt, although she had rigged her broken spar and set a small topsail; this, however, was not enough to compete with the others, particularly when off the wind.

As the steamer was obliged to return, to be in time for the arrival of the first-class yachts, we could not exactly ascertain the precise time the second-class rounded the flag-boat at Coal-house Point; but we hear the Curlew rounded about two or three minutes before her competitors. Gnome and Mystery had a very close run of it, and they were for some time neck and neck; but Mystery contrived to get away from her, and won by 36 seconds only. There is not the slightest doubt that but for the barges, &c. Gnome would have had the first prize. Every one apparently wished success to the Gnome from the great interest her proprietor has taken in the R.T.Y.C. She was beaten by very little; and we are happy to see there is every chance of the "wooden walls" of old England maintaining their superiority over the innovation of iron in a future race. The first-class yachts arrived at Greenwich as follows:—

Mystery	..	..	23 m. 22 sec.	past 5
Gnome	..	..	24 m. 0 sec.	past 5
Enigma	..	..	26 m. 0 sec.	past 5
Gazelle	..	..	30 m. 45 sec.	past 5
Phantom	..	..	31 m. 50 sec.	past 5

The £8 and Class:—

Curlew	..	..	50m. 0 sec.	past 5
Saucy Jack	..	..	53m. 20sec.	past 5
Rival	..	..	57m. 10sec.	past 5

The prizes were then presented to the successful competitors: the 50 Guinea Tankard to Lord A. Paget, who returned thanks in a neat and appropriate speech; as did Capt. Meeson, on receiving the Claret Jug; and Mr. Rees, the small Tankard. The commodore, Capt. Meeson, and a number of members and their friends dined at the Club-house, Greenwich, and the company broke up, greatly delighted with the sport afforded them, and the kind attention of the worthy commodore.

The Mystery was steered by Mr. Stokes, and Lord A. Paget; the Gnome, by Mr. H. Gibson, and Capt. Meeson; Phantom, by Mr. Selby; Gazelle, Mr. Condy and Mr. Snook; and the Enigma, by Mr. T. Wilkinson.

HORSE RACING IN THE REIGN OF CHARLES II.

We here present our readers with what may be termed one of the "curiosities" of Horse-racing, originally considered as a liberal pastime, and practised for pleasure rather than profit, without the idea of reducing it to a system of gambling. About the period we have illustrated, however, "Horse-races were desports of great men, and good in themselves, though many gentlemen by such means gallo,ed quite out of their fortunes."

Horse-racing, as practised in the present day, may be dated from the reign of James I.; the races being then called "Bell-courses," from the prize being a silver bell. At the latter end of the reign of Charles I., races were held in Hyde-park, and at Newmarket, and the prize changed from that of a bell to a cup.

After the Restoration, Horse-racing was revived and much encouraged by Charles II., who frequently honoured this pastime with his presence; and, for his own amusement, when he resided at Windsor, appointed races to be held in Datchet Mead. He was also regular in his attendance at Newmarket, now boasting every accommodation for the training of horses, with an excellent race-course, which, as the system progressed, was apportioned into distances, corresponding with the several ages and supposed powers of the horses. By this arrangement, as well as by a judicious appropriation of the different weights to be carried, according to similar circumstances, a scale of equality was kept up, highly to the credit of the turf regulations, and very favourable to the increase of its popularity. Indeed much of the arrangement and most of the rules and regulations now in force were formed about this time, and under the auspices of Charles; and it would appear that in the house fitted up and kept for his use in Newmarket, he passed some of his most pleasant hours.

Charles, likewise, occasionally visited other places where Horse-races were instituted. The following doggrel verses, written at the close of the seventeenth century, relate to the sport at Burford Downs:—

"Next, for the glory of the place,
Here has been rode many a race—
King Charles the Second I saw here;
But I've forgotten in what year.
The Duke of Monmouth here also,
Made his horses to sweat and blow;
Lovelace, Pembrook, and other gallants
Have been venting here their talents,
And Nicholas Bainton on Black Sloven,
Got silver plate by labour and drudging."

Our engraving has been derived from prints and other authorities of the period it illustrates; the details of costume and appointments, together with the breed of horses, being taken from well-authenticated sources.

HORSE-RACING IN THE REIGN OF CHARLES II.

GORHAMBURY RACES—FROM A SKETCH IN THE PARK.

GORHAMBURY RACES.—TUESDAY.

The scenery, the picturesque style of "fitting-up," the course, the facility with which by railway to Watford, and thence through a pretty country to the race-course, have been for years the theme of praise in the mouth of every visitor. The journey from the metropolis to the Park may be performed in a couple of hours, and the determination of the noble owner of the property to give every possible effect to the new regulations with regard to defaulters for stakes and bets, has been the subject of well-merited praise. The sport, the fashion of the company, and the courteous attentions of the stewards and their officers to their respective duties—every thing was in keeping with the established character of the meeting. To conclude without a list of the principal visitors would be to neglect one of the most onerous of our duties. We must, therefore, in the first place give the names of the party at Gorhambury; it consisted of the Duke of Rutland, Marquis of Exeter, Earl and Countess of Clarendon, Earl and Countess of Albemarle, Earl and Countess of Sefton, Earl and Countess of Craven, Lord and Lady Folkestone, Earl of Strasbroke, Lord Maidstone, Mr. S. Stanley, Mr. C. Greville, Mr. Gregory, Mr. F. Craven, &c. There were also present—Marquis of Worcester, the Earls of Chesterfield and March; Lords Macdonald, Glamis, A. Fitzclarence, W. Poulett, E. Russell, Villiers, G. Manners; Count Bathyany; Sirs D. Baird, C. Cockerell, F. Goodricke, and W. Wynn; Honourables R. Grimston, E. Grimston, G. Fitzroy, G. Anson, — Stanley, — Paulett; Colonel Bouverie; Messrs. Archdall, H. Blair, J. Stanley, Delme Radcliffe, Neville, Newton, &c., &c.

The races commenced about half-past one, with

The Craven Stakes of 10 sovs each, with 20 added; 3 yrs, 6st 12lb; 4 yrs, 8st 7lb; 5 yrs, 9st; 6 yrs, and aged, 9st 2lb. Cherry-tree Mile. (4 Subs.)

Lord E. Russell's Nat, 4 yrs .. .. (Sly) 1
Mr. Philimore's Physalis, 3 yrs 2

5 to 4 agst Physalis, 3 to 1 each agst Hyrcanian and Gaiety, and 4 to 1 agst Nat. Physalis made running at a good pace, attended by Gaiety, the others laid up to their quarters; they ran in this way to within half a distance of the chair, when Gaiety fell back, and Nat joining Physalis, got to her head a few strides from the chair, and won by half a neck. Hyrcanian a respectable third.

The Gorhambury Handicap of 25 sovs each, 15 ft, and 5 only if declared, with 50 added; the second to save his stake. Stand Course. (51 Subs; 32 declared.)

Lord G Bentinck's the Devil-to-Pay, 3 yrs, 5st .. ..(Abdale) 1
Duke of Grafton's Cataract, 4 yrs, 7st 5lb 2
Lord Verulam's Robert de Gorham, 5 yrs, 8st 12lb 3

The Devil made play at a good pace, followed by the Artful Dodger, Emilian third, and Robert de Gorham fourth, the lot running clear of the ruck. This order was maintained, with scarcely any change, to the last turn, where Emilian passed the Artful Dodger, ran with the Devil-to-Pay to the T.Y.C. post, and was beaten. Robert de Gorham then took his ground at the Devil's quarters, Yardley following them, with Cataract at their heels; this formation continued within two distances of the chair, until the final change took place. Robert de Gorham was beaten, and Cataract became the Devil's next and last competitor. The run home was so close that it was not until Abdale called upon his horse, that he defeated his opponent winning, not easily, by half a length. Robert de Gorham was a length behind Cataract, Hyrcanian fourth (a bad one), and the others so completely tailed off, that it would be idle to specify the order in which they passed the chair. The pace was good. This is the third great handicap that the Goodwood three-years-old have won this year.

The Prize Stakes of 20 sovs each, h ft, with 20 added; for three yrs old; colts 8st 7lb, and fillies 8st 4lb. Cherry-tree mile, &c. (7 subs.)

WEDNESDAY.

The abundance of racing reserved for the second day rendered a closer adherence to the "order of running" necessary than was observed on Tuesday; accordingly it commenced a few minutes after one o'clock. The sport, good, and plentiful enough to satisfy any reasonable appetite, presented only two features of any interest beyond the moment—the Park Stakes for two year olds and the Double Headed Oaks Stakes. The first, for which 12 out of the 18 named came to the post, was run in "heats," owing, as established before the stewards, to the horses having started before Mr. Robert Grimston, who officiated on this occasion, lowered his flag, Treen alone having pulled up on hearing that gentleman declare it was to start. The Double Headed Oaks Stakes was an agreeable surprise to the fielders. Charlotte, upon whom 6, 7, and 8 to 1 was laid as soon as it was made public that The Devil to Pay had paid, having been beaten in a trot! Of these, the other races, and of some important fluctuations in the betting on the Derby and Oaks, we have below given all needful particulars.

The racing came off in the following order:—

The Fondyard Stakes of 5 sovs each, with 20 added; winner to be sold for £150, &c. Stand Course. Seven subs.

Even betting on the Maid of Orleans, 6 to 1 agst Mystery (taken) 6 to 1 agst Bastion (taken), and 6 to 1 bar 1 agst Mr. Flare. The first start, as we have already stated, was a failure; at the second, all got off except Bastion, and ran the entire distance, the Maid of Orleans winning easily by a length and a half. Mystery declined by several of the field on the return to the weighing-stand, an information was given to the stewards that Bastion had been left behind, and that the others had started before Mr. Grimstone had dropped the flag; this, although denied by several of the field, was proved to be the fact. Grimstone was then the case, and the stewards, in consequence, pronounced it a false start. 2 to 1 was then laid on the Maid of Orleans, 4 to 1 agst Mystery, and 5 to 1 agst Bastion. In the actual race, which did not take place till after one more false start, Bastion made the running to the distance, where the favourite went in front, had the rest of it to herself, and won in a canter by two lengths; Corinthian Tom was a bad third, Chevisaye and Peculiar next, and the others beaten off. Gaselle and My Mary were drawn after the first heat.

The St. Alban's Handicap of 15 sovs each, 5 ft. and 25 added, with a whip presented to the winning jockey by the ladies. Heats. Stand Course. Six subs.

The first heat was won by a head, and the second by a length. Naworth was beaten two lengths in each heat.

Betting.—6 to 5 was laid on Naworth before the first heat, and 2 to 1 on Counsellor after it.

RATAN.

In our journal of the week before last, we engraved "Ugly Buck," the winner of the 2000 Guinea Stakes, at Newmarket, and favourite for "The Derby;" and we now present to our readers his competitor, "Ratan," drawn by Mr. Hall, of Newmarket.

Ratan, the property of Mr. Crockford, is a light chesnut, with good shoulders and depth of girth; beautiful back and ribs; excellent quarters, with great length from hip to hock, and with a good neck, with clean gullet, rather plain head; excellent constitution and temper. Stands nearly 16 hands. His performances are as follows. He won the New Stakes at Ascot, beating Assyn, 8lbs extra; Charming Kate, and others, at Goodwood. Assisted Pet, and three others, by three lengths. At the Newmarket Houghton Meeting, 10lbs extra, won the Criterion, beating Pastoral, 8lbs extra; Seaport, Molly Mogg, Lightning, Creme-one, 5lbs extra; Elemi, Velocity, and Filbert, by four lengths. At the late Newmarket Craven Meeting won a Sweepstakes of 50 sovs. each, D.M., beating Delapre, Crosby, Sir Diggory Dodkin, Nalinka colt, Escrick, The Buisterer, and Numenius. Won by two lengths. Has first appearance in the public betting ring was on the 16th of June last, when 20 to 1 was taken about him.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

ANTICIPATIONS OF EPSOM.

N.i adeo magnum nec tam mirabile quequam
Principio, quod non minerant mirarien omnes Posteritas.

Eels, says the proverb, become used to skinning: custom, asserts our motto, reconciles mankind to all things. The most reasonable instance that can be adduced of the truth of that latter axiom is one to be found every spring on that portion of the Bacstead Downs which lies nearest to the town of Epsom. There, about this time, are annually celebrated certain saturnalia of freebooting, to which three-fourths of the Metropolis and vast multitudes from the rural districts repair. This domestic festival of the Juggernaut is known as Epsom Races, to which the victims are seen proceeding, like Brahmin's wives to the sacrifice, arrayed in their holiday suits, and accompanied by groups giving expression and extravagant joy. Concessionaires of late years have been led to a conclusion that oblations of this description are more honoured in the breach than the observance, and that, if possible, the Brahmin should be prevented from burning his rice, and the Briton from burning his fingers. Without offering any opinion as to the propriety of the first of these practices (concerning which, indeed, a good deal might be urged on both sides), we hazard a belief that society is not likely to gain much by a system under which increases the worldly goods of any of its members exactly in the ratio of their knavery. Such is the case with the sacrificial priests of these ceremonies—yclept, in the vernacular of their profession, "legs;" and therefore it is our purpose for the future, on the eve of their great solemnities—such as those of Epsom, Ascot, Goodwood, Doncaster, and Newmarket to detail the real character of the rites. With this view we address us to the ceremonial to be observed at the former of those places during the ensuing week.

"Nil adeo"—and so forth, observes our motto, as if the writer had the last half century of Epsom meetings in his mind's eye. We, ourselves, can call back every anniversary since Sadler's wells (of course, inclusive), and a truculent chronology it is! Such suicidal episodes; such dilapidations of goodly names, and annihilations of goodly lineages: and to what end? to the promotion of sport, of liberal intercourse, of social friendship? No: but for the maintenance in course debauchery and foul idleness of a society of men, who, in any other situation in life, would find their way in a twelvemonth to St. Luke's. The interest, that is to say, the excitement of the metropolitan race meeting, is confined to two events—the Derby and the Oaks—and to these our anticipations are confined. The former comes into the market with force in the preceding autumn; the latter can hardly be rolled a public speculation till the day before it is disposed of. In the Derby, therefore, because of the length of time allowed for operations, the grass amount of several turf chicane, sharp-ing, and swindling, contrivable tricks are revealed on every anniversary, while some peculiar stroke of policy distinguishes each from all its predecessors. During the present season, and for the four last months of 1843, two horses occupied a place in the odds, of which there appears to be no chance that the money—an enormous sum—has been laid out on the Ugly Buck and Ratan, two animals generally believed to belong to the two greatest professional betters connected with the English turf. To this, and not to his merits, the Buck undoubtedly indebted for his place in popular favour, to say nothing of the second. You ask any racing man, "How comes it that the Buck is at 2 to 1?" and he answers, "Because he has been backed for so much before so much!" He is the reader cannot understand how the speed of a race-horse is improved by the act of wagering on his success; he must apply to some one to solve the problem, unless, indeed, Lord Palmerston should do it for him, in his forthcoming report on the "Gambling Bill." Nine-tenths of the capital invested on the Derby comes from the pockets of the public, by which is meant men who bet as an affair of amusement—while the whole mesh nery of the odds, whereby alone betting is reduced to certain gain, is directed by those who make speculation or Horse-racing a business. We write for those who use the turf as a good old national sport: many thousands of them will read this article, and such as adopt the truth it would fain inculcate, will have no reason to regret their taking its writer for their "philosopher and friend." As a pleasure tyrat the meeting in Surrey next week holds out inducements that few will withstand, having opportunity and means: no one ought, that is prepared to use them wisely. Let the pleasure seeker go abroad in a spirit fitted to his pursuit: he shall have nothing to do with the ring or its subtleties; the odds or their agitations their changes or their chances (whose courses so little depend upon the bias). He shall take his pleasure in the contests for Derby or Oaks—not in the hope (chance is there none) of filthy lucre, but because of the natural instinct towards such chivalry, whereof Juvenal says—

Volucrem
Sic laudamus equum, facili cui plurima palma
Fervet et exultat rauco victoria Circo.

Some very remarkable results are likely to arise out of the meeting to which this notice relates. Should the Buck win, it is certain five per cent. will not be paid upon the amount lost on him: should he lose—as all his performances warrant the conclusion that he will—the public will again, for a few brief weeks, wonder at the cunning which fooled them to the top of their bent—and begin the same round for '45. A man, some years ago, set up a shop in the town of Shoreham, for the sale of an article, whose name, written in gli.liographics on every pane of the window, neither himself nor anybody else could make out. His neighbours remonstrated with him on having recourse to a trick only suited to pitrap fools. "My friends," said he, "if all the fools that pass my door will deal with me, I'll not begrudge you the custom of all the wise men." Such is the principle upon which the legs act, and thrive exceedingly: they are not so indifferently off for patronage that we should volunteer as their customers.

TATTERSALL'S.

MONDAY.—From an early period of the afternoon until nearly seven in the evening, the room and the "circle" were crowded with speculators from all quarters; but, although within nine days of the races, business was uncommonly dull. It is true that many persons who stand well on the two favourites squared their books, by "putting a little" on a few hor-es that are supposed to have outside chances, such as Alkarb, Running Rein, Ionian, Qui Tam, and Feigh-a-Ballagh, and have thereby enabled a few to escape with a loss; the only real betting was on the two, the Buck maintaining a decided lead, with a host of supporters, and the certainty of getting to 7 to 4. 300 to 100, two or three times; 13 to 4, in two or three places; and 7 to 2, freely, were taken about Ratan. Scott's two, Leander, Mount Charles, and King of the Gipsies were only at nominal quotations. For the Oaks, Sister to Martingale was reported to be amiss, and went to 12 to 1. All-Round-my-Hat and April Fool's name prominently into notice, and are likely to become better favourites before next Monday.

THURSDAY.—After some two hours had been devoted to comparing books, the betting commenced in earnest on the Derby, confined, however, to a very select number of favou ites. Upwards of £2000 was laid out on The Ugly Buck, at 9 to 4, and, at least, £1500 on Ratan, at 10 to 3, and 7 to 2; the latter arrived in town on the evening of the Cotherstone commissioners, nevertheless, there are plenty of good judges who will not "have him" at any price. Orlando improved four points, and may be the Colonel's nag—this, however, does not seem to be quite certain, notwithstanding the 15,000 to 200 bet on Ionian, of which so much has been said. Mr Ford's horses improved on Monday's quotations; and may still to see a better day. The Oaks betting, at least all that is worth mention, was confined to the following: Sister to Mertingale (again "All right,") Mecope, All-Round-my-Hat, Emerald, and some outriders. Crenoline is amiss, and will not run.

SALE OF HORSES.—Thursday last 26 lots of horses were brought to the hammer at Tattersall's, Hyde-park Corner. Amongst the lots were several first-rate hunters and ladies' horses, &c., some of which had been hunted during the season with Lord Southampton's and Mr. Drax's hounds; and others that had performed with the Northamptonshire and Pytchley packs. Several harness and other horses of a minor description were also disposed of by auction.

AQUATICS.—The following events have been fixed to come off as stated:—June 10—Royal Thames Yacht Club (match for the Grand Challenge Cup). June 15 Scullers' match at Norwich, between Mr. Corbyn and Mr. Wigham. June 20—Amended City of London Club Regatta, Kew and Putney. June 21 and 22.—Henley-on-Thames Regatta. June 20, 21, and 22—Royal Thames Regatta. August 17—Royal Yacht Squadron match at Cowes, for Her Majesty's Cup. Some minor matches will also take place for the Queen's cup race. No arrangements appear to have been yet made respecting the dispute between the Henley and Royal Thames Regatta Clubs, so that some alteration may take place as to the days they have respectively fixed upon for their annual regattas of a minor description will take place on the Thames during the season.

ROYAL THAMES REGATTA CLUB.—The Club now consists of a Patron, seven Vice-Patrons, a Committee of Management, including the President, Vice-President, Hon. Secretary and six other gentlemen, with several honorary members. The Patron is H R H Prince Albert. The Vice-Patrons are the Duke of Buccleuch, Earl of Jersey, Earl of Chichester, Northumberland, the Earl of Ripon, Viscount Castlereagh, Viscount Grimston, and the Vice Chancellor of England; the Vice-President of the Club is J. D. Bishop, Esq; the Treasurer, Capt. Austen, R.N.; the Hon. Secretary, J. H. Jenkins, Esq. The list of the various aquatic clubs connected with the regatta was given in last week's number of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS. A very large subscription is expected to be derived from all these clubs. The University of Oxford will, as a matter of course, head the list as usual: its members were the successful competitors for the Gold Challenge Cup last year. The Silver Challenge Cup was won by the Leander Club.

On Thursday evening, a Special General Meeting of the members of this club was held at the British Hotel, Cockspur-street, for the purpose of receiving the entries for the Grand Challenge Cup, to be raced for on the 10th of June. The following boats were entered: Enigma, 28 tons, Josiah Williamson, Esq. Exquisite, 15 tons, C. R. Tatham, Esq. Gazelle, 28 tons, S. Rutherford, Esq. Sea Belle, 23 tons, Thomas Green, Esq. Gnome, 28 tons, Captain Messom. Mystery, 25 tons, Lord A. Paget, M.P. It will be seen that there are eight match yachts connected with the club. After some unimportant business the meeting separated.

During the last season some very spirited contests took place between the members of the Oxford Club and those of Cambridge, which certainly showed the superiority of the former. The most interesting ever witnessed at any regatta was the grand heat for the Grand Challenge Cup, at the Henley-on-Thames regatta, held on the 29th and 30th of June, 1843. On the first day the three first heats were rowed, Oxford having won by the Cambridge boat, beating the London and the Oxford Aquatic Club boats. The second heat was won by the Oxford University Club boat, beating the Etonian Club boat cleverly. The third heat was won by the Oxford University boat, defeating the Trinity Club boat. On the second day the grand heat came on between the Cambridge eight appeared in their boat, and were soon joined by the Oxford University eight. On the word being given, Mr. Menzies, who pulled the stroke oar of the Oxford boat, was taken suddenly ill, and obliged to give up. As the Cambridge gentleman exercised their right of not allowing any other gentleman to fill his place, the eight pulled over the course against the Cambridge eight, and defeated them after a gallant contest.

IRELAND.

Twelve houses at Stradbally were burned down on Wednesday by incendiaries. The extensive mills at Colloony, occupied by Richard Mangan, Esq., were destroyed by fire on Sunday last.

The Apostle of Temperance has returned to Cork, from Castlecomer, where he preached and administered the total abstinence pledge to 12,000 persons. Amongst the number signed the lady of Colonel Bryan, of Jenkinstown, sister to the Countess of Shrewsbury.

The surrounding country was illuminated on Wednesday night, for the supposed triumph of O'Connell over the Attorney-General, in the Queen's Bench. The signal fire blazed upon Carrigoonatil Castle, at the Queen's-bridge of the Shannon, and was soon reflected from the county Clare side of the river, where it ran into the interior.

FABRICATED OUTRAGES.—Great excitement prevails in the county of Roscommon, in consequence of charges of a very extraordinary character having been brought against Pierce Fry, Esq., son of a magistrate of that county, and a person high connected.—Mr. Fry has been charged with deserting his tenant Edward Dox, to kill a mare, his property and with subsequently swearing an affidavit, in which he stated that the mare was killed by some malicious person for the purpose of obtaining compensation of the county for the pretended malicious injury. There was also another accusation against Mr. Fry, to the effect that he had caused a threatening notice to be written and transmitted to himself. After hearing evidence at the adjourned inquiry the magistrates, five in number, received informations against Mr. Fry, who has been held to bail to stand his trial at the assizes.

REPEAL ASSOCIATION.—The usual weekly meeting of this association was held on Monday at the Conciliation Hall; Richard Albert Fitzgerald, Esq., exgustice of the peace, of Mocanedge House, in the chair. The amount of the rent for the week was announced to be £430.

POLICE.

WORSHIP-STREET.—A NEW WAY TO PAY OLD DEBTS.—On Wednesday, William Seare, a fancy baker at Twickenham, and James Seavile, his brother, in the same business at Hoxton, appeared on a summons before Mr. Broughton, the magistrate, upon charges preferred against them by Mr. John Dene, a surgeon on half pay, and Mr. Henry Dene, his son, who stated himself to be a medical man, but not at present in practice. All the parties were attended by their solicitors. The defendant, William Searle, was last week charged before Mr. Bingham, when it appeared that the captain, now resident at Walbrook-row, Hoxton, lived some time since at Twickenham, and the defendant, meeting him by accident in London, demanded payment of a bill for linen drapers and cakes supplied to him, as the defendant alleged, at Twickenham. The captain denied the debt; but the defendant having followed him home, paid him repeated visits, and made a disturbance at the house, for which he was given in charge to the police, and held to bail by the magistrate. From the evidence now given, it appeared that after the first defendant had been held to bail last week, both he and his brother went to the house of the complainant, and being refused by the captain, who declared that he did not owe anything, they continued about the door for two or three hours, stopping the passers-by to tell them it at the complainants had left Twickenham without paying the other debts, and that the very coats they had on were not paid for. The defendant James declared that if the money had been owing to him he would have had it out of the captain's bones, and his brother then said, "I wish I had killed the heavy-headed old fellow long ago." Having proceeded in that way for several hours, they threatened to return the next morning with chairs and a bottle of wine, and to sit at the door all day. The magistrates now fined the defendant William 40s., and his brother 20s.

THAMES POLICE.—ROBBERIES BY A POLICEMAN.—Francis Harris, a police constable, No. 89 K, and Eliza Harris, his wife, were brought before Mr. Broderip for re-examination on several charges of robbery preferred against them. It appeared from the evidence that the woman had lived as cook in the residence of several respectable families, whom she had plundered, and her husband, who received his appointment as a police constable two or three weeks ago, had been receiving the property, well knowing it to be stolen, and disposed of it principally at the pawnbrokers' shops. About two months ago, and since the male prisoner has been employed in the force, his wife obtained the situation of cook in the family of Mr. Dodds, a gentleman residing in West Ham-lane, Stratford, Essex. Her husband lived at No. 23, Vincent-street, Stepney, and in consequence of his landlady frequently observing valuable property in his apartment, and linen with Mr. Dodds' name upon it, she gave information at the Arbour-square station-house, and on Friday last Hams a police-constable No. 240 K, waited upon Mr. Dodds, who then for the first time missed various articles, and on the following day he went to the lodgings of the male prisoner, in his absence, where he found a coat, three tablecloths, four towels, two sheets, two pillow cases, five dressing-gowns, a bar of soap, a velvet cape, two cambric handkerchiefs, three d'oyleys, six china cups and saucers, and a variety of miscellaneous articles. The whole of them, with the exception of the coat, were identified by Mr. Dodds as his property. On Sunday last Hams made another search in the prisoners' lodgings, where he found nineteen duplicates; and they principally related to printed books, which had been purloined from the library of the Freemasons' Grand Lodge-room, North Brixton, where the female prisoner lived for about six months. Mr. Simpson's library contained upwards of 1000 volumes of books, and he missed several valuable works while the woman was in his service, and complete sets of other works were spoiled by the destruction of odd volumes.—The male prisoner admitted receiving all the articles, and said his wife informed him they were given to her by Mrs. Dodds, her mistress. Hams said he was present with a search warrant of robbery against the prisoners, but all the witnesses were not in attendance.—Mr. Simpson wished his case to be disposed of summarily.—Mr. Broderip said he should not be justified in any such thing; robberies by servants were so frequent, and were of such magnitude, that it was necessary prosecutors should do what was required of them.—He committed the prisoners for trial on two charges, and remanded them on the third till Saturday.

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

SUDDEN DEATH OF A LADY.—The lady of Mr. MEGRAY, brother to the Lord Mayor of London, arrived at Lavender-hill early on Monday morning, from Dublin, and, having been indisposed on the passage, she was conveyed in a car to the house of Mr. Cripps, surgeon, Dale-street, where, notwithstanding the means that were employed for her relief, she died in the course of a short time. The cause of death was congestion of the lungs.

DREADFUL ACCIDENT.—A shocking accident occurred at Blenheim Palace on Tuesday. News arrived in the afternoon of the death of a son by the Marchioness of Blandford. Some cannon in the park were fired off in honour of the event, when a young man named Henry Sumner, who was employed in discharging one of the guns, was promoted to rank, and, unfortunately, having cleaned it; having put in the charge, it ignited from some fire left in the gun, at once exploded, and blew off both his hands. He was as speedily as possible brought to the Radcliffe Infirmary, Oxford, where every attention is being paid him, but with very slight hopes of his surviving many days. He is age is 25, and he has a wife and two children.

FATAL ACCIDENTS BY DROWNING.—Mr. Samuel Theodore Lobatt, aged 23, one of the principals at Hermangild, Castellani, and Co.'s, in Copthal-court, the Belgian Consul, lost his life, by falling from the Cameleon yacht, on Saturday last, during the time it was releasing its moorings in the Royal Victoria Dock, for which purpose he had been presented with a gold medal and vote of thanks by the Royal Humane Society. His parents reside at Ramsgate, his father being Captain of the Packet for that port. His son, on Tuesday, held an inquest at the Spread Eagle, Millbank, as to the death of Mr. Charles Wilson, aged 25, who was drowned by the upsetting of his boat on the previous Wednesday. The party was fishing, and standing in a perpendicular position through the fourth arch of Vauxhal-bridge on Monday morning. He was in the office of Sir George Stephens for many years, and was a most exemplary, worthy, and intelligent man. The coroner was told that several persons had witnessed the upsetting of the boat, and had gone to the assistance of the deceased, but as the constable had had no opportunity of summoning them, the inquiry was adjourned, to obtain their evidence. The bodies of Mr. Bramwell, of River-street, Islington, solicitor, and Mr. A. Ryland, son of the barrister, who were drowned under very nearly similar circumstances, have not yet been found.

EXTRAORDINARY ROBBERY.—On Tuesday information was received and circulated that, on Friday night last, the house of William and John Peat, at Little Sutton, in the parish of Sutton Coldfield, was entered by four men, who robbed it of £200 in Bank of England notes, and also a quantity of gold and silver, the amount of which is not stated. The bank notes were six for £100 each, Nos. 26,189, 27,683, 27,279, 27,856, 27,905, and 24,135. A reward of £100 is offered for the apprehension and conviction of the offenders.

ACCIDENT IN HYDE-PARK.—On Monday afternoon, about three o'clock, as James Frogget, a groom in the service of Lord Byron, was following his master, in horseback, in Hyde-park, the horse he was riding, a young and spirited animal, suddenly reared and plunged, and the unfortunate groom was thrown off, and, in his fall, received a fracture of the right leg, and other injuries. He lies at the institution in a deplorable state of suffering.

ACCIDENT TO BOARD THE RESCUE STEAMER.—On Monday, whilst the General Steam Navigation Company's steamer Rescue on her usual passage to Ramsgate, the numerous passengers on board were greatly alarmed, when off the Nore, by hearing loud agonising shrieks proceeding from the engine-room, which were immediately ascertained to have emanated from a man named Newell, a stoker, having become entangled in the machinery. It seems that he had but a few minutes previously replenished the fire, on doing which he sat down on a piece of wood placed on board to assist him in getting speedily through some unaccountable cause, the board suddenly slipped, and he fell amongst the machinery. Great cries immediately brought assistance, and after great difficulty, the engine being stopped, he was extricated, when it was found that his left leg was completely smashed in several places, and was only hanging by ligatures. The steamer being close to Sheerness, she bore down to one of her Majesty's ships for medical assistance. The wounded man was then conveyed on board a great steam upon the flaming premises, which quickly extinguished the fire; not, however, until the whole of the upper part of the building, together with the machinery on board thereon, were destroyed. It is considered fortunate that the fire broke out at so early a period of the night, as the court is a very narrow one, and towards morning each room in almost every house in it is occupied.

The inhabitants of Clint and Burn Yates, in the parish of Ripley, Yorkshire, have presented the Rev. J. E. Robson, incumbent of Hartwerth, with a silk gown, as a token of their gratitude for his giving them a gratuitous afternoon service.

THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY.—The proceedings of the General Assembly, which will excite great interest under the present circumstances of the Church of Scotland, commenced on Thursday last, at Edinburgh. The Marquis of Bute, her Majesty's High Commissioner, will have his residence, levees, and entertainments at the Palace of Holyrood during the sitting of the Assembly. The levees or public entertainments will be held on each day of the Assembly, half an hour before its meeting. His grace attended divine service in the High Church, Edinburgh, on Thursday. The Free Church Assembly met at Edinburgh at the same time.

THE THEATRES.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

Herold's chef-d'œuvre, "Zampa," is about to be withdrawn at the moment it has reached its highest excellence. Nothing could have been more beautiful than its performance on Tuesday evening. Persiani and Corelli (who is beginning to be known and admired) sang delicously, and Fornasari, on the last act, was truly admirable. In the ballet of "Ondine" Cerito was again marvellous—enchanting. In the "pas de l'ombre," which was not all shadow, as upon a recent occasion, she never appeared more light—air seemed to be her element. She certainly must be composed of caoutchouc, for nothing more elastic can be imagined. The house was most brilliantly attended.

The Benefit of Lablache is fixed for Thursday night, for which occasion he has very judiciously selected Cimarosa's lovely opera of "Il Matrimonio Segreto." It was in this work that his wondrous organ, buffo supremacy, and artistic excellence burst upon the habitués of Her Majesty's Theatre. The cast for Thursday embraces Grisi, Persiani, Favanti, Mario, F. Lablache, and the mighty bénéficiaire. A new ballet divertissement, entitled "La Vivandière," is to be produced, in which the REAL Polka will be introduced by Cerito and St. Leon.

MUSIC.

ANCIENT CONCERTS.

The sixth concert of the series took place last Wednesday, under the direction of the Earl of Cawdor, who made the following selection, partly from his own extensive musical library.

PART I.

Selection from Te Deum	Jomelli.
Air, Miss S. Flower, "O Salutaris"	Cherubini.
Aria, Signor Salvi and Chorus, "Qui presso al mio Gene"	J. S. Bach.

Maundicat.—Solos by Miss Marshall, Messrs. Barnaby, Horncastle, and Machin	Mozart.
Aria, Madame Dorus Gras "Infelice Sconsolata"	Mozart
Mo etto, "Veni Sancti Spiritus"	Zingoni.
Duetto, Madame Dorus Gras and Signor Salvi	Clari.
Grand Chorus, "Ye Sons of Israel." (Joshua)	Handel.

PART II.

Overture (Armida)	Glück.
Solo, Madame Dorus Gras and Chorus, "Non adegnare"	Glück.

Recit. and Air, Herr Staudigl, "Dio prottor," with Chorus	Glück.
Aria, Signor Salvi, "Ah! tomar la bella Aurora"	Cimarosa.
Grand Chorus, "How excellent" (Saul)	Handel.

Conductor, Sir H. R. Bishop. Organ, Mr. Lucas.

We have no hesitation in saying that this concert was the most delightful of the season; the selection was judicious, and the several items most admirably contrasted. Nothing could have shown a more just appreciation of the giant Handel's power than making each part wind up with one of his mighty choruses. Miss S. Flower sang Cherubini's air very charmingly. Madame Dorus Gras was a musical rocket in brilliancy; her performance of Mozart's difficult scena was astonishingly fine. Zanotti's motetto is a fine composition in the old school. Clari's duet was beautifully given by Dorus Gras and Salvi; but, perhaps, the style of the music is a little too obsolete. Herr Staudigl in Righini's air was very fine, and was most admirably accompanied on the oboe by Grattan Cooke. His performance of Glück's aria in the second part was not quite so happy. Bishop's arrangement, or rather union of the two old subjects by Wilson and Saville into a serenade, was very happy and was effectively performed.

WILLIS'S ROOMS.—SHAKSPEARE READINGS, BY MR. C. KEMBLE.

By the word "Readings" we were led to expect some illustration of, or commentary on, the text of Shakspeare, last Monday evening, at the above rooms; the more particularly as they were announced to be directed by the first of Shakspearian-histrionics, Mr. C. Kemble. We were disappointed, and that, too, in a variety of unexpected ways. However unacquainted some of the higher classes in the land may be with the productions of the bard of Avon, there is no one with any pretension to literature, who has not only read his works, but can fluently quote them, and apply their poetry and wise aphorisms to almost every scene or occurrence in life. The mere reading, therefore, of Shakspeare compressed," could be but little popular to those who have already not the whole of his works by heart, and still less gratify such as had but slight acquaintance with him: for a reading desk or rostrum is not the place from which to unfold his musical philosophy to pour forth—he was the painter of the passions, and we would rather imagine his vivid and glowing descriptions, than see them at second hand in water colours. There is no sermonizing Shakspeare—you must either see him acted truly and powerfully or you must read him to yourself, in your closet, and fancy, or recollect, what a Siddons, a Kemble, an O'Neill or a Kean could or did effect by the just comprehension of his various characters, and a faithful utterance of his sentiments. Shakspeare cannot be read to an auditory like a newspaper, nor can any one person supply the nuances of "voice, face, gesture" of the different dramatis personæ. Moreover, the Green-room reading of the liveliest comedy that ever was written, is about as dull an affair as can well be endured, but Shakspeare from a pulpit "won't do at all!" It

> "Crushes him together, rather than unfolds
> His measure duly."

Mr. Kemble commenced his "lectio" by enumerating the different characters in the play of "Cymbeline," and then proceeded to generally read, occasionally recite, as many passages as were by him deemed worthy excerpta from this wild and poetic drama. The thread of the story was perhaps a little entangled by his omissions, but through them some objectionable passages were avoided, and that second to be more the intention of the reader than curtailment, we wonder why some speeches in Scene IV., Act 3, between Imogen and Pisanio, were not expunged. Mr. Kemble's reading (we mean, of course, his locution) was feeble as long as he was merely reading, but occasionally he forgot his restrained position—thought himself once more upon the stage, and both in action (as much as could be allowed), and inflection of voice, gave some passages with peculiar felicity. It is curious to remark, that one of the most effective things was a lyric portion of the drama—the beautiful song of Guiderius and Arviragus over the body of the supposed dead Fidele—"Fear no more the heat o' the sun," to which (using some words contained in itself) Collins's "To fair Fidele's grassy tomb" is as the "reed to the oak." Mr. Kemble's delivery of Arviragus's speech, "With fairest flowers," in Act IV., Scene 2, was very beautiful. It was read with a most touching tenderness: but we beg of him not to allow Lindley Murray to interfere with Shakspeare. In the passage—

> "Thou shalt not lack
> The flower that's like thy face, pale primrose; nor
> The azur'd hare-bell, like thy veins; no, nor
> The leaf of eg antine, whom not to slander,
> Out-sweeten'd not thy breath."

The substitution of which for whom may be more grammatical, but the personation is destroyed.

Mr. Kemble divided his reading very judiciously—ending his first part in the middle of Act III., where there certainly is a pause in the action. In the second we thought him superior, for he seemed to get warmer in his subject, and forgot the rostrum for the stage. All the explanatory scenes in the fifth act were admirably given; better, perhaps, than only one could express them, except a "well-graced actor, who had (known) left the stage." In this portion of his reading Mr. Kemble spoke the sentiments of the conflicting characters with more peculiar truth, or idiosyncrasy, as we may say, than in the former parts of the recital. Before we conclude, we must remark one thing which in a great measure mars the effect of these readings; that is, describing the entrées and exits, and other stage regulations in sotto voce, and then resuming the text in one register: for soprano, Imogen; basso, Cymbeline; tenore, Posthumus; and, we suppose, barytone, Iachimo, cum multis aliis. The room was fashionably and intellectually attended, but not "crowded to suffocation." The next reading will be, we understand, on Monday next, the subject "King John." We were glad to see Mr. C. Kemble in such apparent good health.

LITERATURE.

SCENES AND TALES OF COUNTRY LIFE; WITH RECOLLECTIONS OF NATURAL HISTORY. BY EDWARD JESSE, ESQ. Few anecdotical books of natural history have acquired extensive celebrity as those from the pen of the author of the work before us. Without, however, in the kindly school of Gilbert White, the circulation of such works must be productive of incalculable good, even among "the educated classes," to whom, from their cost, they principally find their way. In the "Scenes and Tales," Mr. Jesse has made a treasurable addition to this elegant "family library." Possessing, from his official position as "Surveyor of her Majesty's Parks, Palaces, &c.," innumerable opportunities for observation, there is a value attached to his recorded traits of natural history which frequently reconciles us to their trifling character: they are, indeed, the table-books of a field-naturalist, and every page bears testimony of his every-day experience. In no respect, however, is this merit more beneficially shown than in the almost unfailing tendency of the anecdotes he relates of animals to impress upon the reader the duty of humanity and tenderness to the lower creation—a lesson which cannot be too strongly enforced upon all classes; for, the ancient dogma to assert that inhumanity is as often the result of thoughtlessness as of ignorance, and is but too frequently practised by those who, in common parlance, "ought to know better."

The present volume opens with a few pages of "Contemplations on the Works of God," written in a truly Christian spirit, and specially aiming at the object we have adverted to—the inculcation of humanity, as in the following passage:—

> The study of the works of creation is well adapted to assist us in acquiring a knowledge of the Great Creator, and of forming our minds into a tranquil and happy state. Our affections will be refined by it, our dispositions become gentle and kind, and we shall have an employment equally useful and innocent. We shall then learn that what we now consider trifles in the scale of creation are not so, but value them as convincing evidences of the wise control of a beneficent Providence.

Here, too, is a delightful vignette of

WINDSOR GREAT PARK.

> I shall always reflect with pleasure on some interesting rides I had this spring with an intelligent friend and naturalist in the stately forest glades of Windsor Great Park and Forest. The genial sun had invigorated the earth—everything had just burst into freshness and beauty—the birds sang their joyous notes—the cuckoo was heard in every direction—the green woodpecker uttered its wild cry, and the herons were making their first preparations over our heads, as we rode under the trees on which their nests were forming. We there contemplated an enormous beech tree (and there are very many in this fine park), spreading its wide-extended branches, which were clothed with their early and glittering leaves, while the sight of some sturdy old oak pollards, covered with ivy, from which
> The stock dove only through the forest coos
> Mournfully hoarse—
> verdant hollies, and here and there a wild cherry tree, with its silvery blossoms, added to the charm of the scenery. Sometimes a rabbit, a hare, or a pheasant would run for shelter amongst the fern—a herd of deer might be seen reposing in some sequestered dell, or a group of cattle indolently standing in the shallow water of a pond. Such was the spot we were engaged in contemplating with that delight which a lover of nature alone can experience (it was near the Sandpit Gate), when our attention was called to the hoarse croaking of a pair of herons, who were apparently endeavouring to take possession of one of the nests of the herons that build on the tops of the trees, which, in this part of the park, far exceed in height any I have yet met with. The heron defended its nest with great courage, uttering shrill and distressed cries, and after the battle had lasted some length of time, the ravens were beaten off.
> Thus heronry is a noble appendage to the Park, and any monarch might well be proud of it, as well as of the trees on which the nests are built. As I am not aware of there being more than eleven or twelve heronries left in this country, it is to be hoped that every care will be taken of the one referred to. Seven pecial tree were formerly imposed on any person killing a heron, and I believe that the laws enacting them have not been repealed: at present we find herons amongst the trophies raised by keepers upon some stunted oak tree, in the midst of a desert of heath, which, although the damage they do to fish ponds is comparatively trifling, feeding, as they chiefly do, upon frogs, snails, water-rats, and small eels. In the breeding season, when they have to provender for their ravenous young, they may attack the larger sort of fish, but the interest which must always be attached to the royal bird, connected as it is with the chivalry and ancient sports of this country, ought to be sufficient to protect it from wanton destruction, independently of its own wild and picturesque character.

As we proceed, we are much interested in what may be termed Popular Errors respecting those much abused and persecuted animals:—

THE HEDGE-HOG, THE MOLE, AND THE OWL.

> The Hedge-hog is one of those persecuted animals, which the superstitions of the vulgar and ignorant have denounced as injurious to man. These little inoffensive animals are, therefore, killed without remorse, and nailed to trees and barns as trophies of the zeal and activity of their destroyers. They have been accused of sucking cows, injuring the dugs, and destroying their young, all of which accusations are equally erroneous. So far from being hurtful, they are beneficial to man, by feeding on slugs, snails, beetles, and other insects, thus assisting in keeping down too great a number of these pests, and preventing their becoming injurious to our fields and gardens. The hedge-hog will also feed upon fruit, such as apples, pears, &c., and, I have reason to believe, on blackberries. I have also been assured that it will suck the dugs of cows, and even those of ewes, but I have never, with all my inquiries, been able to procure a satisfactory proof that this was the case from any of the keepers in the royal parks, in most of which the hedge-hog is incidentally to be met with. I will also add, that Mr. Waite, in his history of Selborne, mentions its eating those of the plantain in his garden. It remained, however, for Professor Buckland to introduce this animal in a new character—viz., that of a devourer of snakes.
> The hedge-hog is readily tamed, and will become familiar and even affectionate, as is the case with most animals, when treated kindly. It is to be hoped that these facts may assist in rescuing it from the persecution to which it has so long been subjected.
> The Mole, also, is another of these useful animals which the ignorance and prejudice of man has doomed to destruction, and against which he wages continual warfare. Such is the impression of the injury done by them, that in some parts of Buckinghamshire the farmers are in the habit of carrying on war when they walk in their fields, in case they should see the earth in the act of being turned up by the moles. When this is the case, the farmer fires at the spot, and thus many more are killed in the course of the year.
> So far from the mole being an injurious, it is a most useful animal to the farmer. The little hillocks it casts up are generally composed of a rich and fine mould, extremely beneficial to the land where spread, and this should be done daily, or as often as the mole-casts are observed. A little boy may thus be profitably employed at a trifling expence. Young wheels, for instance, this sort of top-dressing is sometimes of the larvæ of the cockchafer and of worms, for the moles are ever on the

He was distinguished by his General Attainments and Learning: his Knowledge of the Laws, Customs, and Privileges of this City: his Integrity of Character, and universal Benevolence From his earliest Youth he was devoted to the Service of his Fellow Citizens, and throughout the Course of his Life proved himself a ready Defender of their Rights and a Zealous Promoter of their Interests. He was elected Common Clerk or Town Clerk of London A.D. MCCCXVII and held that Office for Twenty One Years, during which period he Completed the Valuable Treatise still extant under the title of "Liber Albus." He likewise represented the City in Parliament A.D. MCCCCXXXVI. and MCCCCXXXIX.

As one of the Executors of Sir Richard Whittington he conferred essential benefits on the City by promoting various Public Works, especially the erection of Conduits, the Rebuilding of New are the Enlargement of the Hospital of Saint Bartholomew, the Compeiion of the Guildhall, and the Formation of a Library attached thereto, to which he subsequently bequeathed sundry Rare Books or the benefit of Students resorting to the same. In token of his eminent services e was honoured both by his Sovereign and Fellow Citizens with peculiar immunities and privileges.

(No. 1 on the Right.)

He left Munificent Bequests to the Charterhouse and the fraternity of Sixty Priests in London of which Brotherhoods he was a Member, as well as to many other Religious Establishments and Persons; also to the Hospitals of Saint Mary Within Cripplegate, Saint Mary Without Bishopsgate, Saint Bartholomew in Smithfield, Saint Katherine near the Tower, and Saint Thomas in Southwark, to the Houses for Poor Lepers at Holborn, Locke, and Hackney, and for Poor Madmen at Bethlem; and to the Poor Prisoners in Newgate, Ludgate, the Fleet, Marshalsea, and King's Bench; and the Prison of Convicts at Westminster.

(No. 2 on the Right.)

He Died on the xvith. of May MCCCC XLII. and was Buried Before the Chancel of the church of Saint Peter Cornhill, of which Parish he was an Inhabitant and a Liberal Benefactor Thus His Comprehensive Charity Embraced all the Necessities of his Fellow men, and the General Conduct of his Life Exhibited the Character of one Who (in the Words of Holy Writ) Desired "To do Justly, Love Mercy, and "Walk Humbly with his God."

The Lord Mayor then proposed "Honour to the Memory of John Carpenter, and Prosperity to the City of London School." The pupils of the school passed in order in front of the statue, and proceeded to their places in the theatre, wherein the Lord Mayor, in very warm terms, expressed his congratulations on the completion of the honourable and interesting memorial to the founder of the school; and after an address from the head master, and the recital of two original compositions in honour of John Carpenter, by two of the senior pupils, the proceedings terminated with a vote of thanks to the Lord Mayor, amid loud acclamations. A vote of thanks was then passed to the chairman, Mr. W. S. Hale, and the committee, for their judicious management of the institution committed to their care.

The statue is ten feet in height, but, as it stands, it does not appear more than the ordinary height. It is composed of a very compact and finely-grained limestone, closely resembling marble. We are not aware of the cost, but it has been erected at the expense of the Corporation of London. The figure is very carefully dressed in the costume of Carpenter's time, and exhibits great taste, as well as considerable antiquarian research in its details. The statue is very finely worked, the forms boldly modelled, and the shadows so disposed as to give an air of grand solidity to the whole composition.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.—On Wednesday last there was a trial of new compositions by the band of this society, at the Hanover-square Rooms, when the novelties produced were two symphonies by Schubert and Gadé, neither of which made any great impression. A manuscript overture by Mendelssohn delighted everybody: we shall shortly hear it in public.

MADAME PUZZI'S CONCERT.—On Wednesday the first concert of the season (at Her Majesty's Theatre) took place, and was most brilliantly attended. To enumerate every item or every excellence of this delightful treat would far exceed the bounds of our time and space: suffice it to say, there has been rarely collected together such a constellation of talent: throughout Europe nothing could be found to surpass the vocal and instrumental strength combined on the occasion:—singers like Grisi, Persiani, Dorus Gras, Favanti, Shaw—Mario Salvi, Fornasari, the Lablaches,—instrumentalists like Offenbach, Parish Alvars, Puzzi, Benedict, Costa, &c., oh! there is nothing like it in the world! Even that epicene artiste Sr. Leon, half violinist, half dancer, and wonderful as each—he too must needs be among the throng. The concert was a most exquisite treat.

JOACHIM.—This wonderful youth will perform a concerto on the violin at the fifth concert of the Philharmonic Society, which will take place on the 27th instant.

SALVI. This great tenor will shortly proceed to Dublin and appear in a suite of operas. No doubt he will be supported by Madame Eugenie Garcia, who has recently produced a great effect in that city.

EXETER HALL.—Mr. Perry's oratorio, "The Death of Abel," was performed here on Friday evening with great effect. We shall analyse its merits next week.

MENDELSSOHN.—At last this great musician has been enabled to reach our shores. He conducted the last Philharmonic concert, and, it is said, will continue to wield the orchestral baton to the end of the season.

GIUBILEI.—This most amiable man and distinguished artiste had a benefit on Thursday night at Drury Lane, when a host of brother and sister talent appeared to prove the high estimation in which he is held by them, and how sensibly they regret the long and severe indisposition which has deprived the profession of his valuable services.

MADAME ANNA THILLON.

This charming vocalist and fascinating actress is, we are happy to say, a native of London. Her maiden name was Hunt. A thousand romantic causes are assigned for her adopting the profession of which she is such an ornament, but the real one was the embarrassment of her father's circumstances, which reduced him suddenly from affluence and splendour, and forced him to retire to France and live in obscurity. How often does a reverse of fortune bestow the most brilliant ornaments upon the arts! Having married M. Thillon, the chef d'orchestre of the Philharmonic Society of Havre, she determined upon appearing in public, and accordingly made her début in "Der Freyschütz" at the little theatre of Clermont, where she met with prodigious success. From thence she proceeded to the Grand Theatre of Nantes, where she continued for two years, increasing in fame and ability. The young vocalist was on the point of setting out for Italy, "cette patrie des beaux arts," where the Director of the Theatre of La Rénaissance, M. Anténor Joly, who was seeking in the provinces for artistes for the new Theatre Ventadour, heard the prima donna of Nantes, and was so charmed with her, that he prevailed upon her to relinquish the idea of visiting Italy, and engaged her for the French capital, where she shortly afterwards appeared in Lady Mebril, and forced the Parisians to confess that our fair countrywoman was not only a great singer, but one of the greatest actresses that ever trode the stage. Since her début she has continued to delight more and more—every new part she has appeared in has added an additional rose to her chaplet of fame. Of composer and public she is equally the idol—Auber has composed some of his most delightful morceaux for her: in fact, she is so much the rage with the frequenters of the Opera Comique, that we know not by what ingenious means Mr. Maddox has contrived to steal her away from them. No matter; we have her, and hope to have her long, to delight us with her rare combination of talent as an accomplished vocalist, and almost unrivalled actress.

STATUE OF THE FOUNDER OF THE CITY OF LONDON SCHOOL.

On Monday, this well-regulated foundation was the scene of a very impressive and gratifying ceremony—the inauguration of a statue of John Carpenter, the founder of the school; the above day being chosen as the 402nd anniversary of this excellent man's birth.

At three o'clock, the Right Hon. the Lord Mayor and the Committee, accompanied by numerous members and officers of the corporation, and other visitors, proceeded from the committee-room to the spot where the statue was appointed to be placed, on the first landing of the great staircase, opposite the south entrance to the school. The statue was suspended immediately over the pedestal on which it was to stand, and the Lord Mayor, at the request of Mr. Nixon, the sculptor, prepared the pedestal for its reception by spreading some mortar on the top of it. The statue was then lowered and adjusted into its proper position, and the tackling and covering were removed, so as to expose it to the full observation of the company assembled. The Rev. Dr. Mortimer, the head master of the school, then read the following inscription, containing a compendious history of the founder, according to a document recently discovered amongst the ancient records of the corporation. This inscription occupies five sides of the pedestal, which is octagonal; and it is distributed as follows:—

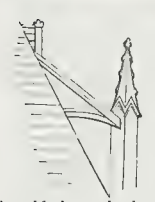
STATUE OF JOHN CARPENTER, AT THE CITY OF LONDON SCHOOL.

THE TRIGONOMETRICAL SURVEY.—SPIRE OF THAXTED CHURCH.

One of the points selected for the purposes of the Trigonometrical Survey of England, now in active progress, under the superintendence of the officers of the Royal Engineers (Sappers and Miners), is the spire of Thaxted Church, near Epping, in Essex. The church is one of considerable beauty, of a late period of Gothic architecture: it is built of rubble, with stone dressings, the rubble being coated with cement, so as to give the whole an appearance of stone. It consists of a nave, with a clere story, aisles, chancel, transept (north and south), porches, and a tower surmounted by an elegant spire, nearly 200 feet high. Around the spire is erected the scaffolding supporting the platform for the purposes of the survey, presenting a singular aspect. The construction is firm and ingenious—every advantage being taken of the conditions of the spire. From each of the lowest windows are seen projecting a couple of planks laid edgewise, well secured at their ends at about eight or nine inches apart, blocked together, and forming a case for the reception of the main scaffold poles.

THAXTED CHURCH SPIRE.



The plan of the spire is octangular, the windows being in every other face; and, consequently, the plan of the scaffolding is square. The projecting ends of the planks are further supported by struts from the roof of the tower; horizontal ties are fixed upon the projecting planks, over the flying buttresses, and between the finials of these and the spire. The main poles are received in the before mentioned cases, formed by the projecting planks, and are braced by horizontal and diagonal ties, and firmly secured to the spire, the whole height to the platform. The platform is hexagonal, and is supported by the main poles and extra struts from these. From the lowest windows of the spire the ascent to the platform is by ladder, as shown in the drawing.

A daring fellow of the corps of Sappers and Miners ascended the spire, prior to the erection of the scaffolding, by means of the crokets, and removed the vane, weighing about a quarter of a hundred weight.

Tribes of London.—Persons of ordinary observation, whose necessities or tastes lead them into different parts of this polypus-like metropolis, must be aware of the different aspect of its inhabitants, according to the division of town they are traversing. For the various portions of the earth are not more distinct, as regards their aborigines, than the many quarters of London, each to each. The West-end patrician and the inhabitants of the Western Isles; the Greeks and the roués of Leicester-square; the savages of the Parific and the denizens of the Rookery; the tribes of the two Turkeys and the commercants of the Poultry, as the former of these differ on the mighty earth, so do the latter in the mighty city; and, although in both cases commerce leads them into other districts, yet their leading features remain the same.—Punch.

Hints to Wives.—There are two ways of discharging your household duties. If you are languid and listless, you may let them alone; if not able, you should be continually turning the house topsy-turvy, under pretence of setting it to rights. You can either let your servants do just as they please; or you may be continually in the kitchen, looking after them. In the latter case, scold them frequently, and in an audible voice, so as to be heard up stairs. Never think of looking to your husband's shirt buttons; leave that to the laundress; or, if you must attend to his linen, superintend your washing in person, and have frequent water parties; and, especially in winter, always have the clothes dried before the parlour fire.—Punch.

Italian Music.—The music of Italy was made the subject of a lecture by Mr. C. E Horo, on Tuesday evening last, and is one of a series of lectures which he has engaged to deliver on the history and progress of the music of eight different nations, at the Royal Polytechnic Institution, each of which is to be continued for one week, this being the first on that interesting and musical land.

Westminster Bridge.—Sir R. H. Inglis has obtained a return, which was moved on Tuesday, of the sums of money expended in the alterations and repairs of Westminster-bridge, and the probable costs of completion, as also of the income arising from property belonging to the commission. It appears that the total amount of expenditure from the 5th April, 1810, to the 5th April, 1838, was £83 997 6s 9½d. The total amount expended, or now due for repairs since 1839, is stated at £82,661, and the total amount required for further works is estimated at £52,879. It appears that the total income of the commissioners of Westminster-bridge is £7464 11 8d. Upwards of £200,000 has been expended in the past and present repairs of Westminster-bridge since the year 1810.

How to Obtain a Situation in the Excise.—Take the liberty of distilling your own whisky, without paying your proper duty to her most gracious Majesty; persevere, and doubt not but in good time you will find yourself in a very pretty situation.—Punch.

HISTORY OF WOOD-ENGRAVING.

Among the engravers and designers on wood who were pupils of Bewick, and who have contributed to the extension and promotion of the art, the following may be considered as chiefly deserving of notice:—John Bewick, his brother; Charlton Nesbit; Luke Clennell; and William Harvey. On the expiration of his apprenticeship, John Bewick came to London, and during his residence there he engraved the cuts for the following works:—"Emblems of Mortality," with cuts, chiefly copied or altered from those in Holbein's "Dance of Death," printed in 1789, for T. Hodgson, the publisher of, the "Hierogiyphic Bible;" Dr. Trusler's "Progress of Man and Society," 1791; and "The Looking Glass of the Mind," 1796. Though several of those cuts display considerable talent, yet the best of them are better in the design than in the execution. The best specimens of John Bewick's abilities as a designer and engraver on wood, are to be found in Goldsmith's and Parnell's Poems, 1795, and Somerville's "Chase," 1796, both printed in quarto, by Bulmer. Most of the cuts in Goldsmith's and Parnell's Poems were drawn by John Bewick, who also engraved the vignettes on the title-pages—the large cut of the "Old Woman Gathering Water-cresses," and the tail-piece at the end of the volume. The others were engraved by Thomas Bewick. All the cuts in Somerville's "Chase," except one, were drawn by John Bewick, but none of them was engraved by him. Shortly after he had finished the drawings on the blocks he returned to the north in consequence of ill health, and died at Ovingham on the 5th December, 1795, aged 35. All the cuts in the "Chase" were engraved by Thomas Bewick, with the exception of the tail-piece at the end of the volume, which was engraved by Nesbit.

Charlton Nesbit, on the expiration of his apprenticeship, came to London about 1799, and continued to reside there till 1815, when he returned to the north. In 1830 he returned to London, where he remained to the time of his decease, which happened on the 11th November, 1838, in the sixty-third year of his age. In 1799 Nesbit engraved a large cut, containing a view of St. Nicholas' Church, Newcastle-on-Tyne, from a drawing by his fellow apprentice, Robert Johnson. For this cut, which is one of the largest that had ever been engraved in England, Nesbit received a medal from the Society for the Encouragement of Arts and Manufactures. Nesbit's best cuts are to be found in "Religious Emblems," published by R. Ackermann and Co., 1808; Savage's "Decorative Printing;" Northcote's "Fables," Second Series; and in the edition of White's "Selborne," published by Baldwin and Cradock in 1834.

Luke Clennell, who attained a high reputation as a painter and designer, as well as an engraver on wood, was born at Ulgham, near Morpeth, in Northumberland, on the 8th April, 1781. At an early age he was placed with a relation, a grocer, in Morpeth, with whom he continued till he was sixteen; but having displayed a great taste for drawing, he was apprenticed by his friends, in 1797, as a wood-engraver, with Thomas Bewick, with whom he remained for seven years. For a few months after the expiration of his apprenticeship, Clennell continued to work for Bewick, who chiefly employed him in engraving some of the cuts for a "History of England," published by R. Scholey, Paternoster-row. Clennell, however, having learnt that his employer received five pounds for each of the cuts, for which he paid him only two, sent a proof of one of them to the publisher, stating that he was in reality the engraver. In the course of a few days, Clennell received an answer from Mr. Scholey, inviting him to London, and offering him employment till all the cuts intended for the work should be finished. Clennell accepted the offer, and proceeded to London, where he arrived about the end of autumn, 1804.

One of the principal designers on wood, in London, at that period, was the late John Thurston, who, though an artist of great talent, yet had not so good a knowledge of the means of giving effect to drawings to be executed on wood as Clennell. The latter used, therefore, to occasionally heighten the effect of such drawings of Thurston as he had to engrave, and also to correct and improve them in other respects. Thurston was at first displeased with the liberties which Clennell took with his drawings, but, perceiving the decided improvement which they received, he subsequently allowed Clennell to heighten the effect according to his own judgment. An admirable specimen of Clennell's talent is to be found in a vignette, at page 43 of the octavo edition of Falconer's "Shipwreck," published by Cadell and Davies, in 1808. The subject is a ship running before the wind in a storm; and the motion of the troubled waves and louring appearance of the sky were never more truly represented in an engraving: the whole speaks not only to the eye but to the mind. The drawing was made by Thurston, but the spirit and effect were introduced by Clennell.

The largest and best cut that Clennell ever engraved was for the diploma of the Highland Society, from a design by Benjamin West, President of the Royal Academy. West's drawing was made on paper; the figures within the circle were drawn on the block by DAVID AND GOLIATH.—CARTOON AFTER RAFFAELE.

Thurston; and the supporters—a fisherman and a stalwart Highland soldier—were drawn by Clennell himself. For the part which he drew, Thurston received fifteen pounds. The block on which the drawing was made consisted of several pieces of box, veneered upon beech. One afternoon, when Clennell had been employed about two months upon it, it suddenly split, when he was at tea. As he heard the crack, he immediately suspected what had happened; and, on finding the block split, beyond the possibility of properly repairing it, he, in a passion, threw the tea-things into the fire, and "that day worked no more." He, however, soon got a new block made, of solid pieces of box, firmly screwed and cramped together; and, having paid Thurston fifteen pounds more for re-drawing the figures within the circle, and the supporters, as before, having been copied by himself, he began to engrave with renewed spirit, and completed his work without further mishap. For this cut Clennell received one hundred pounds, he himself paying Thurston for his drawings on the block; and the Society for the Encouragement of Arts and Manufactures presented him with their gold medal. This cut affords a good specimen of Clennell's talents and peculiarities as a wood-engraver—a free and spirited manner of execution in the more important parts; and an artistic "making-out" of the details, with occasional slightness and carelessness in the subordinate portions of the subject. The block engraved by Clennell having been burnt in the fire of Bensley's printing-office, when a comparatively small number of impressions had been printed, the subject was re-engraved, on a block of the same size, by John Thompson.

Among the best of Clennell's small cuts are the illustrations which appeared in an edition of "Rogers's Poems," published in 1812. Those cuts were drawn on the wood, with pen and ink, by T. Stothard, R.A. Several additional cuts, of the same kind, drawn also by Stothard, but engraved by John Thompson, were inserted in a later edition. Clennell, who was an excellent water-colour painter, made many drawings for the "Border Antiquities," and also for other works; and the encouragement which he received induced him to abandon the profession of wood-engraving, and to devote his talents exclusively to drawing and painting. In 1814 he received a com-miss.on from the Earl of Bridgewater to paint a large picture of the entertainment given to the Allied Sovereigns in Guildhall, by the city of London. He lost much time, and experienced considerable difficulty in obtaining liknesses of the various persons—illustrious by deeds, or illustrious by courtesy—whose portraits were to be introduced in the picture; but having at length succeeded in obtaining the necessary sketches, he began his picture; and had made considerable progress in it, when, in April, 1814, he displayed symptoms of insanity, which, becoming confirmed, put a stop to his further progress in the work, and closed for ever his career as an artist. The following account of the first indication of Clennell's insanity we received from one of his intimate and warmly attached friends:—

"I regret to say I was the cause of the first discovery of his mind being affected. Poor fellow! how sadly does the recollection dwell on my memory! I was on very friendly terms with the family of his father-in-law, Charles Warren, the engraver,—as fine a hearted man as ever breathed. I was consequently well acquainted with Clennell, and frequently visited him at his house in Pentonville. I have sat for hours beside him whilst he was engaged in painting that fatal picture. One night a large party of young folks had assembled at Mr. Warren's,—a very frequent occurrence, for everybody went there when they wished to be happy;—and we had spent a long night in junketting and play, and games of all sorts, twirling the trencher, being as I well remember, one of them; and at last had gathered in a large circle round the fire. Clennell was seated next the fire on one side, and I sat next to him. I had remarked that for at least half an hour before he had been looking vacantly under the grate, paying no attention to the fun that was going on. In order to rouse him, I gave him a hearty slap on the thigh, and said, 'Why, Clennell, you are in a brown study.' He gave a faint laugh, and said, 'Indeed I think I am.' He did not, however, become so much roused as to pay any attention to the melée of waggery that was going on. We broke up about one o'clock; and on my calling at Mr. Warren's next afternoon I was shocked to hear from him that he feared Clennell's mind was affected; for, that about three in the morning,—after having gone home with his wife and retired to bed,—he started up and dressed himself, telling his wife that he was going to her father's on a very important affair. As his wife could not prevail on him to defer his visit to a more seasonable hour, she determined to accompany him. On arriving at Gray's Inn-road, he knocked violently, and on being let in by Mr. Warren, he said that he had been grossly insulted by me, and that he was determined on having immediate satisfaction. All Mr. Warren's arguments as to the impossibility of my having intended to insult him were met with positive assertions to the contrary. He said that he knew better; "I had been placed next him on purpose, and it was a pre-concerted thing." Mr. Warren, at last, seeing how t was with him, humoured him so far as to say that he would go with him, and have an explanation, an apology, or satisfaction! They accordingly set out for my house; but Mr. Warren, being now quite sensible on the subject, instead of proceeding towards my house, took a very different direction, and led him about till he became tired; he was at that time any thing but strong. He also by degrees quieted his mind towards me, by speaking of my friendship for him, and my love of art; and by daylight he got him home and to bed. I need hardly say what exquisite pain this account gave me, for I really loved Clennell; he was always so mild, so amiable, in short, such a good fellow."

Not long after Clennell became decidedly insane, his wife fell into the same state, and being attacked with fever, she died after a short illness, leaving three young children. Those heavy afflictions excited the sympathy of several noblemen and gentlemen, admirers and patrons of Clennell; and a committee having been appointed to consider of the best means of raising a fund for the support of him and his children, it was determined to publish, by subscription, an engraving from his picture of the "Decisive Charge of the Life Guards at Waterloo," for which he had obtained a premium from the British Institution. This engraving, executed by Mr. W. Bromley, was published in 1821, and the sum thus raised was invested in trustees for the benefit of Clennell and his children.

Clennell, after having been for about four years an inmate in a lunatic asylum, in the neighbourhood of London, so far recovered, that it was no longer necessary to keep him in confinement. He was accordingly placed under the care of a relation, at St. Peter's Quay, near Newcastle-upon-Tyne, with whom he remained for several years in a state of harmless insanity, amusing himself with drawing, engraving little subjects, of his own designing, and in pieces of poetry, several of which he got printed in Newcastle to present to his friends. He once called on his old master, Bewick, and asked him for a block to engrave, as he wanted employment. Bewick, to humour him, gave him a piece of wood, and told him to make a drawing for himself. On his next visit Clennell brought the cut finished; but though he said that it was the "best he had ever engraved," it was just such a one as an amateur might be expected to produce in his first essays. Clennell engraved several little cuts in a similar style as head-pieces to his poetry. The following are specimens of his poetry at this period. As none of his verses are written in a gloomy strain, it is to be hoped that he felt little of the misery which people, who believe themselves sane, usually ascribe to persons in his state, but that he was cheered by an inward light, which passeth the understanding of the wise.

FOUNTAIN.

"Lady, where do you go?
Do you go to the Spring flow—
Lady, ah! me,
I muse own image to see?
Then, lakest thy date.
Whom thou dost pat with thy hat,
A very ass, as he doth pass,
When he doth sip with his nose
The spring flow—
With thy hand then dost love
The light drop of he use."

SONG.

"An heart have I of a true love framed,
I never could injure thee,
The dew-drop upon the rose
Not dearer is to me.

No sunny ray, at the rise of day,
Doth joy to me can bring;
Or the robin's wild note
In the budding of the spring.

L C St. Peter's, 1820.

Clennell, having relapsed into a state which rendered restraint necessary, was again placed, in 1831, in a lunatic asylum, at Newcastle, where he remained till the time of his death, which took place on the 9th of February, 1840. His great talents and unhappy fate must be our excuse for devoting so large a portion of our paper to his biography, and for thus endeavouring to "give the melancholy theme a more enduring date." Though not personally acquainted with him, we know well the pleasent scenes with which he was familiar when a boy, and which dwelt on his mind and prompted his pencil in the loneliness of his last confinement. Several of the drawings which he made when in the lunatic asylum at Newcastle are reminiscences of the banks of the Wansbeck and of the Coquet, of Bothal and Sheepwash, Warkworth and Weldon, Widdrington and Cockle-park Tower. A monument to the memory of Clennell, executed by Mr. R. Davies, a young sculptor of talent and rising reputation, has recetly been erected in St. Andrew's Church, Newcastle-on-Tyne. We give a view of the monument; but, from a feeling of charity to all concerned in it, we omit the inscription which disgraces it; the four lines of miserable verse contain neither meaning nor truth

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.

(Before Lord Chief Justice Tindal and a Common Jury.)

ELLIOTT v. ALLEN AND OTHERS.

This was an action of false imprisonment brought by the plaintiff against the defendant Allen and seven others, for putting him into a strait-waistcoat, taking him to the parish workhouse, and confining him there for the space of a week. Bevan, one of the defendants, allowed judgment to go by default; the others pleaded—first, that the plaintiff, at the time of committing he trespass, was in the conditions of nearly a lunatic, unable to govern himself; and, secondly, that he was also a lunatic, and dangerous to himself and the public. Mr. Sergeant Talfourd, Mr. M. Chambers, and Mr. Barstow conducted the plaintiff's case; Mr. Sergeant Shee and Mr. Warren appeared for the defendants. The plaintiff, a gentleman of education and acquirements, was the son of a judge in India, and became a clerk in the house of Messrs. Austen and Hobson, solicitors. At that time he occupied lodgs and to the City, but he afterwards took the house, No. 16, Brunswick-street, Islington, where he was residing on the 28th of November, 1842, when the occurrence took place which gave rise to this action. The defendants are respectively the parish of St. Mary, Islington; three of them, Allen, Johnson, and Weston, being the overseers; Hicks, the relieving officer; Ellis, the master of the workhouse, and Semple, the parochial medical officer. It appeared that the plaintiff had exhibited on several occasions considerable violence of conduct, which had been brought under the notice of the magistrates at Clerkenwell police-office, by the defendant Bevan, who lodged in his house, and Mr. Oldershaw, a twenty-inch, received a letter from Mr. Fairoze in the following terms:—"A person of the name of Elliott, in Brunswick-street, is acting much like a madman, and giving away his property. Can anything be done with him, to protect him or his property for his creditors sake, and for his own sake?" Mr. Mallett, the clerk at the Clerkenwell police-office, also wrote the following letter: "Elliott is decided.y insane, wearing a blanket, and not clothes. It appears also that he is in want. We have stated the matter to Mr. Greenwood, and he decides that there is a sufficient case for you to take him under your parochial care—under the provisions of the 9th Geo. IV., c. 40." The parochial authorities accordingly obtained an order for the admission of Mr. Elliott into the workhouse, and Bevan, with three persons, who were at the time passers in the workhouse, were directed to bring him into the house. They proceeded to his residence, and found him sitting in the parlour, whereupon they immediately put on a strait waistcoat, and, so confined, removed him to the workhouse. He did not exhibit any violence of behaviour, complained loudly and much of being deprived of his liberty, made no attack on the liberty of the subject, and threatened legal proceedings. He was placed in a room, a pauper being also stationed there to watch him, and the strait waistcoat kept on during the night. On the following morning medical assistance was called, but his confinement in the workhouse continued for a week, although it did not appear that he was treated with any harshness; on the contrary, his treatment was kind, and only such as was necessary to insure his safe detention, the parish medical officer having formed the opinion that he was insane. The evidence with regard to the alleged insanity was of a very contradictory nature. Several gentlemen were called on behalf of the plaintiff, among whom were Mr. Wilmshurst, a barrister; Mr. Davies, a surgeon, and his brother-in-law; Mr. Rolfe, a surgeon; and Mr. Page, who resides at Dulwich, and with whom the plaintiff had lived since his unfortunate affair. Mr. Wilmshurst stated that they had known him for many years, and always considered him not only of sound mind, but possessed of large acquirements and a powerful understanding. They were much surprised when they heard of the cause of his being shut up in the parlour, medical officer having given no such evidence, which the plaintiff had written to Mr. Davies, his brother-in-law, respecting the treatment he had received, and on other subjects, and they certainly did not entertain any apprehensions of mind. On the part of the defendants it was contended, that they had acted in the discharge of a duty which, from the information they had received, they considered they owed to the public and to the plaintiff himself, in order that he might be protected from injury, and entirely without any malice. Witnesses were then called to prove the alleged act of insanity, from whose evidence it appeared that he was in the habit of carrying a bundle about with him and brandishing it; that he wore a sheepskin instead of a coat; that he used to make orations out of the window to people in the street; that he made a great noise at night, and frequently imitated the crowing of a cock; that on one occasion he was lying on the floor gnawing a bone; that he represented himself to be a prophet, and Moses who had brought the Israelites out of the land of Egypt, that he had a mission to the Indians, and he should go out as a missionary to the Indians; that he kept no servants and did all the domestic offices himself. Mr. Oldershaw, the vestry clerk, proved that he distinctly told Bevan not to use a strait waistcoat without the order of admission to the workhouse, and that he meant to afford him a safe asylum, and that no force of any kind was to be used. All the witnesses were of opinion that the plaintiff was insane. The Lord Chief Justice, in summing up, told the jury it was one for them to say on the part of the parish officers against the particular individual. They could have no motive, as guardians of the parish purse, for wishing to increase the number of paupers in the workhouse by committing the plaintiff there for a week, except that of performing a duty which they owed to the public, in consequence of the information which had been given to them; and supposing they had not acted on that information, the gentleman had turned out a lunatic at large and committed an act of violence, the whole public would have examined against the want of care and improper conduct of these officers of this parish in not having put the law in force. The jury returned, and after having been absent for a considerable time returned with a verdict for the plaintiff, damages, £400.

SUDDEN DEATH.—Between ten and eleven o'clock on Monday night an awful instance of sudden death occurred in the case of Mr. G. A. Wood, commercial traveller for Blakemore and Rock, Birmingham. He was directing his steps towards a coaching-house in Scotch-yard, Bucks-lane, where he lodged; but as he was attempting to turn the corner he fell upon the pavement, and was placed up dead. Upon his person was found upwards of £540 in notes and gold, and a variety of trading samples.

On account of the large imports of foreign barley, the trade with the article was heavy, and the currencies had a downward tendency. The malt trade was in a sluggish state. CORN EXCHANGE.

COMMERCE AND MONEY.

The transactions on the English Stock Exchange, in the course of the week, have not been large, and where they, in any particular manner, attracted the public attention. Capitalists show not the same disposition to invest money in the Consols which they did previous to the terms on which it is intended to renew the Charter of the Bank of England being made public. Since our last publication, a decline in the value of the Consols, of nearly one half per cent, must be attributed to the unsettled state of the money market, a consequence of the limit about to be fixed to the paper currency must be to render money scarce, and the rates of annual interest to be derived from loans of it, higher than they have been for several years past. In the shares of the principal joint stock banks, a considerable degree of animation has arisen, and the value of them is considerably higher than we quoted them in our last number Bank and Indian stocks, also, command their prices.

In the Share Market the usual quantity of business has been again transacted, confidence increasing in the eventual goodness of money so invested. The demand for the shares of those lines of railways which are already completed, has been again rather excessive than otherwise, and their prices are gradually improving. For those lines in progress, and for those in prospect also, there is a fair speculative demand. Although prices are not dearer than they were last week, still the premiums lately paid on them may be accounted for, as the sure purchases cannot be effected. This is a more rational channel for the investment of British money than is to be found in foreign speculations, for, in the meantime, it gives living wages to the numerous artisans employed in its construction, and eventually the same profit to be received by the proprietors will be a large interest on the capital so embarked.

On the Foreign Stock Exchange a good deal of coyness is manifested in the transactions more extensive, and more interesting, than they otherwise would be, for it shows that foreign Capitalists place confidence in the monetary economy of the English bonds or shares in their respective countries. The inquiries are on fly for Dutch Stock, and for the bonds of Belgium, Russia, Austria, and Denmark, and a small improvement must be again quoted in their prices. Spa exhausts every thing, and the Spanish Stocks are in a state of stagnation, but in the time account in the former, the fears have once more laid the upper hand and by the reduction in the Spanish, the former are gradually improving. No. 108, Vol. IV.] FOR THE WEEK ENDING SATURDAY, MAY 25, 1844. [Sixpence.

THE WAR PARTY IN FRANCE.

YOUNG scion of the family of Louis Philippe has just disturbed the repose of his royal father, and stirred up the feelings of the War Party in France, by the publication of a pamphlet on the State of the French Navy, founded, it is said, on official information, drawn from the archives of the Office of the Minister of Marine. The young Princes of the Blood Royal of France are busy men. The Duc d'Aumale is covering himself with such laurels as are to be gathered in the deserts of Northern Africa, where the Arabs are still contumacious, and do not seem to appreciate the blessings of French civilization. At Paris, the Prince de Joinville is throwing parties and cabinets into consternation by a brochure that bids fair to be rather a mischievous one. The animating spirit of the production is one of enmity to England, though a war between the two Powers is assumed as an hypothesis—as a thing of possible occurrence, rather than a measure recommended. As a preparation for this, it is necessary to have the means of fighting at hand, and this is precisely what the young Prince endeavours to show that France has not got, as far as her navy is concerned. He admits, mourning as he admits it, the superiority of England on the ocean; and places the state of our marine forces in contrast with those of his own country, for the purpose of shewing the inferiority of those of France. A desire to see the means of national defence placed on an equality with those possessed by other countries, is not an unnatural one, and may exist without a blood-thirsty inclination to go to war for the sake of proving the possesssion of the tools for it. In England we have had not one pamphlet only, but whole bales of them, published, by officers of all ranks, with the same object. We do not then altogether blame the Prince for venturing into print, as one of the list of "royal and noble authors:" if we are to consider his pamphlet an injury, France might find abundant cause of discontent in the columns of our newspapers, the pages of our United Service Journals, and Naval and Military Gazettes. We refer to it, not to combat its views, for that would be ungracious; we are content to accept the acknowledgment of superiority which the Prince makes so unreservedly. We only wish to point out a curious peculiarity that exists alike in the writings of professional men in both countries on things military and warlike. On both sides there is a disposition to underrate the system of their own governments, and to exaggerate the merits of that of the other country. Every one must remember the weepings and wailings over the "dreadful neglect" of our navy under the late Government. It was broadly asserted that ships, and crews, and armaments, were alike going to ruin, the one perishing of dry rot, and the others growing incapable from inaction. At the time the fleets of England and France were cruising in the Mediterranean, before the settlement of what was called the "Eastern Question," we continually heard and read comparisons quite as odious as comparisons are said to be, of the condition of the two forces. Some time passed on, and it was with no little astonishment the croakers learned that the English fleet, so much vilified, had battered down the walls of Acre, and taken a fortified town at one stroke, that baffled a regular siege from an army headed by Napoleon. Since that event there has been less talk about our inferiority, but the old leaven remains, and Sir Charles Napier and others generally contrive, once a session, to draw a lamentable picture of the state of the English navy, in comparison with that of France?

Well, now we have the other side of the picture. The young and royal Admiral of the French fleet affirms that the coast of France is at the mercy of England; that our steam power would enable us to sweep the Channel; and that the seaports of France are compelled to support the policy of peace at any price with England. Now, we never believed that English ships and English sailors were in the sad state our desponding patriots described them to be; and we also think that the young Prince may have a little erred in the same way, and painted a little too darkly the neglects and short-comings of the French Government, for the sake of pleasing M. Thiers and the Opposition. There is nothing like making a splash and a sensation while you are about it; and a pamphlet written by a Prince was sure, of course, to excite attention. That a military nation like France should bestow more expence and more care on her army than on her fleets is not surprising. Her glories have been gained by her armies; she can boast a list of military commanders, unrivalled by any nation that has arisen since the fall of Rome. Her Condés and Turennes were but the precursors of names that made the glories of the reign of Louis XIV. wax pale beside the triumphs of the Republic and the Empire. On the sea she has no such associations; she has not commerce enough to furnish a nursery for seamen; and we can understand well why her energies have been directed another way. We should think any politician mad who should seriously recommend us to keep up an army as large as that of France, while the tastes, habits, and feelings of the people are opposed to a military life; yet if the principle is a sound one, that the two nations, in the means of offence and defence, ought to be on an equality, no less would be required from our Government. The ability on the part of France to convert herself into a great naval power, may exceed that of England to create a vast military establishment on the continental model—by the conscription and compelled service from all ranks. But it is not the natural tendency of our neighbour to become that maritime nation the young Prince wishes to see her. Colonies and commerce must be first required, and in one of these requisites France is more deficient now than she was at the beginning of the last century. But the knowledge of this fact does not induce one thought or desire in the English people to go to war; and, from what we perceive by the French journals, we think the war fever in France shews signs of abatement. Both nations have unfortunately been taught too much of the evil it brings, to have a desire to rush needlessly into it again. There is better occupation in the world for both than cutting each other's throats on shore, or buccaneering and plundering on the ocean. The Courrier Français says, "If the Genius of Peace have on earth a domicile, it is in France." Long may she inhabit it; we have no fear that she will be disturbed by the English people, though English editors do at times write rather strongly, and we may say not without a spice of insult. But let not the French people ascribe to these "paper bullets" more than their real value; above all, let them not be provoked to return our paper with heavy "metal."

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

(From our own Correspondent.)

PARIS, May 21.

SPAIN.

Our last accounts from Madrid, to the 14th, contain news of little importance; preparations were being made for the departure of the queen for Catalonia on the 18th. Narvaez set out for Barcelona on the 11th. The French and English Ambassadors accompany her Majesty. From the provinces the news received in the capital is far from being satisfactory; the Carlist guerilla bands were on the increase in Andalusia and Old Castile, supported now, beyond all doubt, by a great portion of the clergy and the labouring-classes. As in the too celebrated days of Mina, the civil authorities have caused most barbarous decrees against all those who aid or assist the insurgents. In the neighbourhood of Useras several persons—I am told seven -who had been detected in supplying the Carlists with provisions, had been shot by order of the authorities. The Deputy, Madoz, was set at liberty on the 14th, after an imprisonment of nearly four months, on charges which appear to have been without foundation.

ITALY.

The following has been received from Naples: "The Duke de Montebello has opened negociations with the Court of the Two Sicilies, and has lately taken repeated excursions to Caserta. The object is believed to be a marriage between the Duke d'Aumale and the Princess Maria Carolina, sister of the King of Naples, whose hand has been demanded for the Duke de Bordeaux—a projected union which would be the means of bringing the latter to the throne of which his friend Frizuli says, the elder branch of the house of Bourbon has sent off an Ambassador. Then comes the proposed alliance between Queen Isabella and the Duke de Trapani, still negociating."

The high roads continue to be infested with banditti.

The judicial massacre at Bologna has excited a great sensation throughout Italy. Fifty insurgents connected with the affair of the mountains of Romagna were put on their trial; all the prisoners were of the lower classes. Twenty were condemned to death, 13 to the galleys for life, 1 for 20 years, 6 for 15 years, 8 for 10 years, and 3 for 8 years. The remainder were discharged. Of the 20 condemned to death, 13 had had the sentences commuted to the galleys for life, others were shot.

GERMANY.

Nothing as yet is positively known as to the intended movements of the Emperor of Russia. By some it is stated that he intends visiting Germany, others that he will not quit Russia this summer. The most probable is that the secret give as certain that he will go to Carlsbad, where important negotiations are to take place. The Empress of Russia leaves St. Petersburgh on the 3rd of June, for Reyl n.

The Prussian ministry has undergone a change. Count Alvensleben, Minister of State, retires, and is succeeded by Mr. Bodelschwigh, who is replaced as Minister of Finance, by M. Flottwell.

Serious disturbances have broken out at Paderborn, in consequence of an anonymous letter against the Catholic religion, which is attributed to the Israelites.

A Company has been formed at Vienna for laying down an atmospheric railroad between Vienna and Hutteldorf, by Hietzing and Miedberg, on the left bank of the Wein. The expense is to be 1,200,000 florins. All the shares were disposed of the very day the prospectus appeared.

Baron Maurin de Haber, whose duel caused so much observation, and for which he was sentenced to six months' imprisonment in the fortress of Falenhausen, has been set at liberty, after a confinement of only six weeks, the Grand Duke of Hesse having remitted the rest of his punishment.

SWITZERLAND.

The great—and, I may say, the only subject of conversation here is the pamphlet of the Prince de Joinville on the French navy. All our journals are filled with remarks on this important work.

A rather curious work has recently been published by General de Gerardin, in which he gives in a comparative table the effective forces of all the navies of Europe. "Their united force," he observes, "exceeds that of England by 30 ships of the line, 38 frigates, and 264 vessels of war of a lower class."

Within the last few days the weather has been very cold and rainy; indeed we are in the middle of November, and the fireside is once more a comfort.

On Saturday afternoon, a young gentleman, elegantly dressed, entered the church of Saint Gervais, and after having knelt for some time before the painting of Sainte Juliette, went into the confessional of the chapel, in which it hangs, and appeared to be praying with fervour. At the end of a short time an explosion was heard, and the young man, who had blown out his brains with a pistol, fell backward on the flooring of the church. No papers were found on him to indicate who he was. His body was conveyed to the Morgue to be owned. A marriage was being celebrated in an adjoining chapel at the time of this suicide. The church was immediately afterwards closed to the public, until the usual ceremony of incense should have been performed.

The intended Stag Hunt at Chantilly, on Saturday last, was prevented by the weather. The Duke de Nemours had sent his own pack of hounds to take part in the hunt. The cold and dismal weather caused the attendance to be—weight colts 168lbs., fillies 163lbs.; distance about a mile and a half—won by Lauzone, the property of Prince de Beauveau. Sixteen horses started. The winner was well ridden by Hardy, and is said that the Prince Beauveau wins upwards of £3000 by this race. The Hurdle Race of 1000 francs—gentlemen riders, twice round, and four-feet hurdles to be cleared each time, weight 145lbs.—was one by Le Cottery, property of Count K. D'Arbourg, ridden by M. de Tournon, beating M. Finucane's Wild Girl, ridden by M. Bell. Baron N. de Rothschild's Tiger, ridden by Sir C. Ibbetson, was distanced.

We are very dull in the musical world. The regenerating talisman of Mdlle. Taglioni, commence on the 1st of June and end on the 29th, when she leaves for London. M. and Madame Breten, two dancers from Milan, have made a successful début in "Lady Henriette." Fanny Elssler, on the part of Perth, leaves the end of this month for London.

M. Vatel, the director of our Italian Opera, left Paris a few days since for London, from whence he intends going to Vienna and Venice.

M. Mettermayer, a young tenor, has been most enthusiastically received at Dresden, in "Don Juan" and "Otello."

The grand festival of the Swiss Confederations will take place this year, at Soleure. The orchestra will be directed by M. Schnyder de Martensée, of Frankfort.

The King of Wurtemburg has given 150,000 florins, for the building a new theatre.

It is well known that the tomb of Mozart cannot be discovered, notwithstanding the continual researches that have been made. But one of these researches lately, the tomb of Gluck was discovered, in the cemetery of Watzleinsdorf, at Vienna. The stone was completely covered over with moss; on it was engraven the following simple epitaph:—" Here lies an honest German, a good Christian, and a faithful husband, Christophe Chevalier de Gluck, Master in the Art of Music—Died, November 15th, 1787."

ALGERIA.—MARSEILLES, May 15.—The Moniteur Algérien last received, announces that the troops under the command of the Duke d'Aumale had been surprised by the Arabs.

The following version, published by the Semaphore, represents the matter in a still more serious light: "A correspondent from Philippeville attributes to the most and the panic of the gown the momentary disorder which reigned in the expeditionary column; nevertheless the loss was greater than at first and more than a hundred men killed and wounded. Two pieces of cannon have been taken and retaken. He adds that all the officers of the 1st, 2nd, and 3rd Chasseurs had lost their baggage, and many of their horses killed under them. Four were abandoned all the stores. During the fray the Prince was close pressed, and was relieved by a senior officer. The Duke d'Aumale's horse was struck by three balls, and that of an officer by his side fell dead."

The annexed telegraphic dispatches reached Paris on Wednesday.

"BESANÇON, May 21. A supplement of the Nouvelliste Vaudois of the 19th of May, 9 o'clock noon, announces that war has been declared by the Valais. The Upper Valaisans have seized upon the town of Sion; the Lower Valaisans have risen en masse. Each party has pieces of cannon. A battle was imminent on the 18th."

"TANGIERS, May 9.—There is reason to apprehend here the arrival of the Kabyles from the interior. The Consular body have written to the Pacha, to protest beforehand against this infraction of the peace existing with the Emperor. The British agent has called for the naval forces stationed at Malta, and the French Consul has recalled the Cygne. A reply in the negative is expected to the Spanish intimation that the Captain General of Spain will haul down his flag and embark, if he can succeed in so doing."

THE PRINCE DE JOINVILLE.—A most important article appears in the Débats of Wednesday morning on the subject of the pamphlet of the Prince, and which assuredly speaks the opinion of the highest personages upon that serious production. After a just compliment to the King's sons, generally identified by their education with popular institutions, and after expressing an opinion that the frankness and good faith of this young Prince have been played upon by cunning political leaders, the Débats says:—"We do not believe ourselves guilty of presumption, when we take upon ourselves to assert that the surprise of the young Prince (at the unexpected publication of his note) has been shared in a region even more elevated." It appears, then, that it was by a breach of faith that the note, intended merely for official persons connected with the administration of the Marine, got wind. The Débats still lectures the Prince on the imprudence of his identifying himself with the opposition, declaring "that one cannot be at the same time on the steps of the throne and in the breach of daily political discussion." The disavowal on the part of the Court and Government of the pamphlet has excited a great sensation in Paris, and forms the sole topic of conversation.

At Toriom's to day, the Three per Cents. were quoted at 84 70.

List of Passengers.—Count and Countess Montalembert, child, and servants; Mr. and Mrs. Roskell, and two servants; Mr. and Mrs Gordon, three children, and servant; Mr. Oldham, and servant; Miss and Miss M. The Royal Tar, Benjamin Brooks, arrived at Gibraltar on the 8th of May, with passengers for England, and left again on the 11th for the same destination.

The Pacha experienced strong head winds the whole of the passage, and on Friday and Saturday it blew a perfect hurricane. This is the longest passage the Pacha ever had.

The Florence trader, with fruit and passengers, left Madeira, for England, on the 27th ult.

By the Pacha we have received advices from Lisbon to the 13th inst. The suspension of guarantee (i.e. of the Habeas Corpus) still continued, but would terminate on the 23rd instant, when the Cortes were to assemble again. A considerable number of arrests were still taking place, and though many of the persons arrested had again been set at liberty, most of them were ordered to present themselves every day at the office of the Chief of Police. The Terceira steamer had arrived at Lisbon from Oporto, with between 300 and 400 passengers, last at Almeida. It was thought they would merely be drafted into other corps. A royal decree had been issued for the extinction of the two regiments that revolted, and their numbers struck off the army list. The Prime Minister, Costa Cabral, is known to be in a very weak state of health, and a report was current that he intended to resign office, to be succeeded by his brother, Silva Cabral.

BELGIUM.

ANTWERP, MAY 18.—DREADFUL ACCIDENT ON THE BRUSSELS AND ANTWERP RAILWAY.—A dreadful accident has occurred on the railroad from Brussels to Antwerp, at a station four miles from the latter town, named Bad Cocd. The train which arrived at this station about five o'clock was, while in full progress, thrown off the line, and brought into contact with a luggage train. The concussion was fearful in the extreme; three persons were brought in dead last night, fifteen grievously wounded, and about forty with contusions more or less serious. The accident is said to have been occasioned by the carelessness of the railway servants in attending to the points, so that at the junction with the Ostend line the carriages were thrown off the line, and came into collision with the baggage train. Many of the carriages, fortunately, did not come up, and continued upon the proper line, but were violently separated by the concussion from the remaining carriages. Another account states that the rail was under repair, and that one rail, which was unfixed, was imperfectly adjusted and fastened at the extremity towards Brussels. As the train passed over it the fastening was loosened, and after the passage of the first carriage the end tilted up, caught the wheel of the next carriage, which was thrown off the line, and thus occasioned the accident. The carriages were crowded with passengers, and among them several English people. One Englishman was carried to the hospital of St. Elizabeth, but after having had his wounds dressed was able to be removed to private residence. I could not learn his name at the hospital, as his stay was short, and no record made. Another had his face severely cut and contused, so that his features could not be recognised; and a third, who had left his own carriage and was travelling with his courier, was severely wounded in the legs, but not, it is to be hoped, to require amputation. An English lady is also named as having been killed, but I will not repeat the name, as it is a common one, until I can ascertain if the report is correct. Four German bakers who had been to England, and were returning to their employment, got into a carriage which had been recently painted, and were locked in consequence of the strong smell of the paint. It was a providential removal, for the newly painted carriage was literally crushed to atoms. A Belgian advocate had both his legs so frightfully jammed, that amputation appears inevitable. Some accounts say that there are already ten persons dead, but I hope it is exaggerated. The numbers I have reported were given me at the hospital.

WEST INDIES.

The West India mail, by the Royal Mail Company's steamer Clyde, arrived in town on Thursday morning. The Jamaica files are to the 3rd, Trinidad the 16th, Demerara the 18th, Barbadoes and Dominica the 20th, St. Vincent's and St. Lucia the 25th, and St. Kitt's the 26th ult. The files, as a whole, are nearly a blank for readers in the mother country. The weather is the principal topic dwelt upon in them, and more exciting matter has seldom fallen copiously at some parts in Jamaica, whilst other districts are still suffering severely from drought. There is literally no commercial intelligence worth repeating.

The trial of Mr. Thomas Prescod, the defendant in the Colonial Bank at Barbadoes had terminated in a verdict of guilty. The sentence of the Court was imprisonment as a felon for two years, and to pay the Bank a heavy fine.

We have had Cape of Good Hope papers of the 15th March, but they contain nothing of much public interest. The shipping in Algoa Bay had again suffered from a gale, but with no serious consequences.

We have the British Packet of Buenos Ayres of the 24th of February, which contains a flat denial of the advantage said to have been achieved by Riviero over Urquiza, as related in the last accounts from Monte Video. The invec Lives against Commodore Purvis have undergone no abatement.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT

HOUSE OF LORDS.—MONDAY.

After the presentation of a number of petitions, Lord WHARNCLIFFE moved the second reading of the Factories Bill, and in doing so stated generally to their lordships the principal provisions of the bill, and the nature of the alterations which it proposed to make in the existing law. The main object of General Act contended at considerable length that the hours of labour should be limited more than they were by the bill, but he should make no attempt to effect any alteration in it, believing that it would be productive of many inconveniences to their lordships, and knowing that he differed in opinion upon the subject from many even of his noble friends, with whom he was constantly in the habit of acting.—Lord Brougham believed that the bill, as it now stood, was a mere interference with the hours of labour. He was opposed to the restriction to twelve hours; and, therefore, was still more strongly opposed to a restriction to ten hours.—The Earl of Wicklow believed that the bill, as it now stood, was a great improvement of the existing law, but he exceedingly regretted that the limitation of labour was not carried to ten hours.—Lord Campbell was required that the bill did not go to the extent of limiting the hours of labour to ten hours.—The Earl of Haddington shortly defended the course pursued by the Government in staking its existence upon the success of the bill, believing, as they did, that the adoption of the ten hour limitation would be most disastrous to the interests of the country.—After some observations from Earl Minto and Viscount Fitzwilliam, and Lord Wharncliffe in reply, the bill was read a second time, and the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS. MONDAY.

On the motion of Sir J. Chetwode a new writ was ordered to be issued for the return of a member to Parliament for the borough of Buckingham, in the room of Sir T. Fremantle, who has accepted the office of Judge of May, 1844.

At a subsequent period of the evening, a new writ was also ordered for the borough of Chichester, in the room of Lord Arthur Lennox, appointed one of the Lords of the Treasury.

A number of railway bills having been advanced a stage, the house went into committee on the Bank of England Charter acts, when Sir Robert Peel rose to enter into an explanation of the measure by which he proposed to connection with the propositions which he had submitted for the consideration of Parliament. The necessity for maintaining secrecy as to the intentions of Government had prevented him from making any one of the parties interested prior to his statement on the 6th instant; but now that he had that opportunity, he would say that he had heard no reason suggested which would justify him in departing from his plan as originally stated. He would suppose that the country circulation was eight millions; that the country banks might desire, by agreement with the Bank of England, to reduce it to four millions; and that it might become necessary, which, however, would not be matter of course, for that establishment to make fresh issues in order to supply the vacuum. The cases then in which he would allow the Bank to do so would be those of a country bank failing, or closing, or commuting its own circulation for that of the Bank of England. With respect to the question whether the bullion on which the Bank of England was to issue its notes should be allowed to include that which was deposited as security for advances, he was without at all departing from the great principle that there must be but one standard, and that standard a gold one: all he meant was, that, if a party chose to bring silver to the Bank, he would not refuse to advance a certain limit, per notes in exchange for it. If this were not permitted, the Bank, having no interest in keeping a supply of silver, would probably cease to keep it; but it was important to the country to have access to it, not only for domestic circulation, but with reference to foreign commerce, especially with India and China. He would, therefore, propose to permit an issue of notes upon silver bullion in the proportion of one-fifth of the whole, or one part in silver to four in gold. With respect to banks of issue, he would leave them their circulation until Parliament should make further order, and he would compute that circulation upon the average of what it was in the month from the 7th of May, inclusive, to the 6th of May, 1844, requiring henceforth a weekly publication of it. Where one bank should have taken the business of another, the benefit of the averages of the extinguished bank should be given to the bank which became that of the surviving bank. If a bank should increase its branches, yet it must not be allowed to increase the total of its issues. If private banks should coalesce, the consolidated concern, being still a private bank, should receive no benefit to the benefit of the circulations of all the component banks; but he would not permit a change of character; he would not authorise a joint stock bank to buy up the circulation of private banks. He then explained the way in which he intended that the new plan should operate with respect to those banks which have been issuing Bank of England notes; and announced that the Bank of England was prepared to enter into negotiations with other banks for arrangements under which its notes should be circulated by them. He had been taxed with leaving his arrangement imperfect by an omission to show in what way his plan would let in the operation of the foreign exchanges upon the home issues. Now, he considered that when he destroyed the tendency to unlimited issue from unrestrained competition, he removed the obstacle to the natural and due operation of the exchanges. There had been three great cases in which the currency had been endangered by the refusal of the country banks to contract their issues with reference to the foreign exchanges. These cases occurred in 1825, in 1834, and in 1836. At each of these periods the bullion in the Bank was diminished to a very large extent; and yet, in the face of that fact, the country banks, at each of these same periods, very largely increased their circulation, simply because there were then high prices by which speculation was stimulated. The consequence had been an alarmingly long list of failures among the private banks: in the one year 1840, there had failed no fewer than 24, of which 17 had paid no dividend. It was easy to say that people need not take country notes, but the poor could not help it. He then gave a series of instances of unjustifiable issues by private bankers, terminating in their own ruin and that of multitudes of confiding poor. He had believed that there was a general persuasion of the necessity for putting an end to such a state of things. He was anxious to put an end to it safely; to encourage arrangements between the country banks and the Bank of England, and to discourage the existing system of coming credit into currency. It had been pressed upon him, that legitimate accommodation to the agricultural and other interests would be precluded by this alteration; but no country bank could issue notes even now in the district within 65 miles round London, and yet that district suffered no inconvenience from want of legitimate accommodation. It was no just argument to say that the Bank had now conducted upon such sound principles; the management of the Bank was now confirmed upon much more enlightened views than formerly, and its directors were not to be judged by what they had been compelled to do under the irregular action of the present system of country banks. —Mr. C. Wood gave his cordial support to the plan of Sir Robert Peel, though he had some objections to two or three of its details.—Sir W. Clay also approved of the plan.—After a few words from Mr. S. Worsley, Mr. P. M. Stewart pointed out some objections to the measure, which he admitted to be a bold and patriotic one; and said that at the proper time he would endeavour that they should be obviated.—Mr. M. Gore supported the Government proposition.—Mr. Warburton admitted the necessity of free-trade in banking, and doubted the expediency of regulating the currency by the state of the foreign exchanges. He should give his opposition to the measure proposed to be founded on the resolutions before the house.—After a few words from Mr. Newdegate, Mr. F. Baring supported the proposition, strongly contending for the necessity of placing our monetary system upon a stable and secure basis. —Mr. Pusey regretted that the measure would not be without some practical evil.—After some further discussion, in which Mr. Munts, Mr. C. Buller, Sir R. Peel, Lord Worsley, Mr. Darby, and Mr. T. Baring took a part, the resolutions were agreed to, and the house resumed.

Sir R. Peel, in reply to a question from Mr. C. Wood, said he hoped to be able to introduce the bill, which was already prepared, before the Whitsuntide holidays.

The other orders of the day were then disposed of, and the house adjourned.

HOUSE OF LORDS. TUESDAY.

Lord Brougham laid on the table a bill to amend the Act for the Abolition of Imprisonment for Debt.—It was read a first time.

Lord Campbell reported that the committee to which the Libel Bill had been referred had agreed to certain amendments, which were ordered to be printed.

Lord Brougham moved an address to the Queen for the correspondence which has taken place between the Foreign Office and the British Consul at Tunis, regarding the trial of a Maltese for murder, and for any correspondence which had taken place relative to the interference of the French Consul in the affair. The noble lord condemned in the strongest terms the monstrous interference betwixt the criminal and justice, usurped by the French Consul in that instance; and called the attention of the Government to the generally defective state of our criminal jurisdiction in the Levant. The Earl of Aberdeen, admitting the evils arising from the state of our criminal jurisdiction in the Levant to be enormous, yet pleaded the difficulty of effectually remodelling it as an excuse for not attempting at present more than had been done by the bill of last year. With respect to the conduct of the French Consul at Tunis, Lord Aberdeen stated that no notice had been taken in the proper quarter. His lordship added that, although her Majesty's Government had no wish to protect crime when committed by British subjects, they were by no means indifferent to the rights and the privileges of Christians of all denominations, and he wished to take this opportunity of stating to their lordships that her Majesty's Government has recently been engaged in resisting, and resisting with success, the revival of a barbarous enactment, by virtue of which a person having embraced Islamism and returned to Christianity, was put to death. The house agreed to nonstrous that her Majesty's Government strongly protested against such a course; and it appeared that the Porte had given a distinct consent of the Turkish Government to their desires.—The motion was agreed to.

Their lordships adjourned to Thursday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—TUESDAY.

Mr. Estcourt moved that the bill, intituled, "An Act to rectify a mistake as to the proper line in the Eastern Counties Railway Bill and the Eastern Counties Railway (Brandon and Peterborough Extension, Bill," be read a second time, be committed, engrossed, and read a third time. The object of the bill was to rectify a mistake which had occurred in the house of Lords, whereby one bill had been substituted for another in the last royal commission, a bill which had only passed the House of Commons having been inserted in the commission. The bill was then brought in a new stages, and was passed.

Other railway bills were advanced.

Dr. Bowring gave notice, for the 4th of June, to call the attention of the house to the state of the police of the public streets, and the necessity of reforming them.

Mr. Villiers gave notice, for the same day, to bring forward his motion on the subject of the Corn-laws.

Mr. Ewart rose to move for a committee to inquire into the operation of the Anatomy Act, and into the allegations contained in the petition of Mr. Roberts, presented on the 25th of March last. The hon. member was proceeding to point out the defects of the present Act, when the house was counted out.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—WEDNESDAY.

The House did not sit.

HOUSE OF COMMONS. WEDNESDAY.

Mr. Gaskell, Mr. Ashley, Mr. W. S. Glynne, Mr. Lloyd, Captain Plumridge, Mr. G. Palmer, and Mr. Alix, presented petitions from various places against the Dissenters' Chapels Bill.

Viscount Sandon presented a petition from the American Chamber of Commerce of Liverpool, praying for the Payment of Landing Waiters Bill.

Mr. Muntz presented a petition from the guardians of Birmingham against any interference with the Local Acts in the new law Bill.

Mr. Warburton presented the first report from the Medical Relief Committee, which was ordered to be printed.

Viscount Sandon presented petitions from building societies of Liverpool, against the rating of landlords for small tenements; and one from the journeymen coopers of Liverpool, complaining of distress.

Viscount Sandon presented a petition from the solicitors of Liverpool against the present Ecclesiastical Courts Bill.

Sir G. Clerk obtained leave to bring in a bill to enable her Majesty to carry into effect, by orders in Council, any treaties for the suppression of the slave-trade.

Mr. Greene brought up the report of the committee of the whole house on the Bank restriction, which were agreed to, and a bill ordered to be brought in by Sir Robert Peel and the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

The dropped orders of Tuesday were then disposed of, and the house, which at no period of the evening had more than four-fifths of its members, proceeded to the only order of the day taken, the Smoke Prohibition Bill, which, on the motion of Mr. Mackinnon, was read a second time, and the house adjourned at ten minutes to five.

STEAM-BOAT LAUNCH.—On Wednesday last, a new steam-boat was launched from the building-yard of Messrs. Heighington, Battersea-fields. She is called the Rainbow, and is intended for the Putney trade, to run in conjunction with the Rainbow, Thunder, and Lightning, now on the river. Her engines have been adopted, both in her build and internal arrangements, and it is expected that she will be the fastest boat ever seen on the river. The Sunbeam will be propelled by two low pressure engines of fourteen horse power each, and furnished with Spillar's patent boiler. A select party were present to witness the launch.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—THURSDAY.

The Royal Assent was given by commission to a number of railway and other bills—the Lords Commissioners were the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Lord Chancellor, and the Earl of Devon.

A long and somewhat angry discussion, in which Lord Brougham and the Marquis of Clanricarde bore a prominent part, took place with regard to the Lord Chancellor's Copyhold Enfranchisement Bill, which was ultimately postponed for ten days.—The Creditors' and Debtors' Bill passed through committee, and their lordships adjourned at a quarter to eight o'clock until Friday next.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—THURSDAY.

The South Devon Railway Bill was read a third time and passed.

Major Beresford moved the re-committal of the Harwich Railway and Pier Bill, which, after some discussion the motion was withdrawn.

The Manchester Police Bill was read a second time and passed, as was also the Southampton Improvement Bill, and Hayti Landing-place Bill.

Lord Duncan moved for by Mr. Hume, connected with Corporeal Punishment were agreed to.

The Committee on the Savings Bank Bill was postponed.

Mr. Gladstone gave notice that he had withdrawn the Wharfingers clause from the Customs Bill.

The Dissenters' Chapel Bill was fixed for the 7th June.

Mr. Hume's motion with regard to the fees on honours conferred for eminent public services, was negatived without a division.

Mr. Christie was then proceeding to bring forward his motion for an address to her Majesty to institute an inquiry into the management and condition of the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, when there being only 35 members present, the house was counted out at half-past seven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—FRIDAY.

The Speaker took the oaths and his seat for Launceston, in the room of Admiral Bowles took the oaths and his seat for Launceston, in the room of Sir Henry Hardinge, appointed Governor-General of India.

The South-Eastern Railway Bill was read a third time and passed.

The Sheffield United Gas Bill was read a third time and passed.

A number of petitions were presented by different members against the Dissenters' Chapels Bill.

Mr. Ferrand presented a petition from an individual named Lundy, at Hull, complaining of the conduct of the hon. member for Montrose, who, as chairman of the committee on smuggling, had brought him up from Hull to give evidence before that committee, and refused to give him remuneration for his expenses.—Mr. Hume said he was always ashamed of being duped. (A laugh.) The petitioner had offered to give important evidence on the subject of smuggling, but when he came before the committee he stated a lot of rigmarole (a laugh) —but evidently withheld the information which he could have given. He claimed £17 for his services, and he (Mr Hume) gave him £5; but if the thing were to be done over again he would not give him a shilling. The fact was he had been the dupe of a cunning, crafty man. (Hear, hear, and a laugh.) He could appeal to the members of the committee who were then in the house as to the value of the petitioner's evidence.—Dr. Bowring said he never heard more worthless evidence in his life. (Hear, hear.) Mr. Darby said he believed that it was the general opinion of the committee that the hon. member for Montrose had been done for the first time in his life.

The Bank Charter Bill was brought in and read a first time.

On laying the tenth Report of the Poor-law Commissioners on the table of the house, Sir J. Graham gave notice on the part of her Majesty's Government that on the first day after the recess it was his intention to move the appointment of a Select Committee for the purpose of inquiring into the above.

Mr. W. O. Stanley asked the noble lord the member for Dorsetshire, who was the chairman of the Commission for inquiring into the State of the Poor in England and Wales, when it was likely that the commissioners would make their report.—Lord Ashley hoped the report would be made the first thing after the recess.

Sir S. Peel moved that the house at its rising do adjourn to Thursday, the 30th of May. Agreed to.

In answer to a question from Mr. C. Buller —The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, that on the day after the holidays, he would name the day upon which he would bring on the second reading of the Bank Charter Bill, and take the discussion thereon.

In answer to a question from Mr. Wynn, Lord Eliot said that the returns moved for by the hon. gentleman, on the subject of education in Ireland, were in course of preparation. They were very voluminous, and as the clerks were not remunerated for the extra labour and expense to which they were put in the preparation, he hoped that gentlemen would consider them entitled to some indulgence. (Hear.)

Mr. Villiers postponed from the 11th of June to the 18th the motion of which he had given notice on the subject of the corn-laws. He said as there was but one day in the week on which members could bring forward such motions he might be again disappointed in bringing on his motion, and, if so, he would appoint another day.

Sir R. Peel postponed the Duchy of Cornwall Bill till Thursday, the 6th of June.

On the motion of Mr. Wyse, a Select Committee was appointed on the subject of art-unions.

Mr. Collett wished to know when the Government would bring on the Irish Registration Bill?—Sir R. Peel was understood to say that he could not, at present, fix any time for proceeding with the bill.

The house then resolved itself into a committee of supply.

THE NEW HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT.

As every matter connected with this great national work must necessarily be interesting to a large portion of the community, and as on former occasions we have taken some pains to illustrate and elucidate its complicated architectural details, both externally and internally—pains which, we are proud to say, have been recognised in very high quarters and by high authority—we hasten to lay before our readers the most recent authentic information connected with this subject; and which we have been enabled to derive from an exclusive source.

Something better than two months ago, a Select Committee of the House of Lords was appointed to inquire into, and report upon, the progress of the building of the New Houses of Parliament. That committee have sat at different intervals on five days, commencing the 21st of March last, terminated its labours on the 6th of this present month of May. And although but three witnesses were examined, namely, Charles Barry, Esq., the distinguished architect of the building in question; Lord Sudeley, a member of the committee, and also one of the commissioners appointed to decide on the designs for the New Houses of Parliament; and David Boswell Reid, Esq., M.D., F.R.S.E., so celebrated as the inventor of the system for the warming and ventilating of public and private edifices—the length of the proceedings was such as to preclude the possibility of our devoting as much space to it as we could wish in our present publication, but we may hereafter recur to the subject. However, we will now endeavour to lay as explanatory a summary of the facts stated in the course of the investigation as circumstances will permit.

Mr. Barry's examination occupied the whole of three entire days, and a great part of the other two during which the committee sat.

It would appear that some members of the House of Lords considered that too great a length of time was spent in bringing the works to a completion, and that they were dissatisfied with certain alterations and deviations from the original plan, which had been made, they alleged, without sufficient authority either from the Government, the Board of Works, the Board of Woods and Forests, or Treasury, or Parliament. Their lordships' investigation was chiefly directed towards the erection and internal arrangements of their own house in the new building; and they went at great length into questions of detail connected with the alterations which had been made from the original plan.

Now, it appeared that the original plan itself, which had been selected by the Commissioners, was calculated to cover an area only of four acres and a half, while that subsequently approved of by Parliament in consequence of an acquisition of more space, or the devotion of a greater portion of ground to it, was calculated to cover an area of seven acres and a half.

Mr. Barry contended (and we cannot help thinking with some show of reason,) that any alterations in, or deviations from, the internal details of the original plan had been the direct and natural consequence of certain subsequent instructions and orders which he had received after the enlargement of the area of the building, from the various public Boards and from Parliament, with respect to new plans for warming and ventilating, affording additional accommodations for various purposes not contemplated at first in the building—such as accommodation for a division of police, a place for the records of the empire, and various other conveniences for the residences of different officers connected with these additional departments, for which increased accommodation was demanded. That whenever he had received any instructions to introduce any such alteration and addition, he had always furnished an estimate of the probable additional cost; and though, in carrying out all the minor details of these different additional views, he had not consulted any other authority than his own judgment, he had conceived himself fully justified in what he had done, and for which he considered he had sufficient authority from the different public quarters from with which he had been in communication from time to time on the subject of those alleged alterations and additions.

In the course of his examination he handed in various documents, statistics of the proposed building, his correspondence with the public boards, and also a defence of his own conduct, which ended in the following words:—

"Your Lordships, I think, can scarcely be aware of the enormous extent of labour, responsibility, as well as anxiety of mind, which I have to endure in conducting this great national work, in which, when complete, if there should be anything faulty, I shall be sure to be visited with the entire blame. I am not, however, disposed to shrink from the almost appalling task imposed upon me; and I am firmly persuaded that all great undertakings are best accomplished under an undivided responsibility. On the contrary, I am ready, as I have hitherto ever been, to devote the best energies of my mind to a work which it is my earnest desire to render an honour to the country. But unless I am supported, nay, encouraged, in the performance of my task by the cordial and kind support and indulgence of your lordships, and all who are interested in the success of this, the greatest undertaking of the kind of this or any former period, it is quite clear to my mind that it cannot be brought to a satisfactory termination."

On the second day of the Committee Lord Sudeley was examined at some length, and his lordship proceeded to state, with considerable minuteness and perspicuity, his views, and his objections to certain of the alterations from the original plan which were in progress. His lordship had devoted much attention to the consideration of the plans of the building, and also to the actual carrying into operation of those plans.

Some difference of opinion having arisen as to which certain plan was referred to by his lordship in the course of his evidence, he is asked as follows:—

"Then your objection to what has been done is not, that there has been an alteration, but that that alteration, considering the increase of area, has not been sufficiently effectual to accomplish its purpose?"

"Yes. I object to the present plan, because I think it is not nearly so good a plan as the one before you. And, secondly, I object to it, because the alteration has not carried out his own idea in the best possible manner. But, perhaps, I had better now explain the second plan, taken from the Illustrated London News, and which is now being carried into execution. [The engraved plan referred to by the noble lord will be found in the 74th number, Vol. 3 of this paper.] The Committee will perceive that the Queen will enter the Victoria Tower precisely as she did in the former plan; but, instead of going round a pillar, the royal carriage will now pass through the tower, and under the Queen's robing-room, into the royal court. Your lordships will recollect that the plan before you is not that of the basement, but the upper floor. The royal carriage drives through the tower, the Queen is set down on the left-hand side, and ascends a flight of nine steps to the first landing, where, turning to the right, she has to ascend twenty-five steps more to the right, and from the robing-room proceeds to the Victoria gallery in the house of Lords, which is the present plan of Mr. Barry, executing at this moment. Now my objection is to every part of this plan, except the tower, which is much improved. But I leave to your lordships to consider whether the stairs is a fitting one even for a common mansion. An ascent of five or six-and-twenty steps, without any landing, is inconvenient, and anything but ornamental. Your lordships can scarcely supply any instance of that in any mansion where appearance has been studied."

On being questioned with respect to the number of steps in this staircase, as to whether he could give any instance of such a number occurring, without a break or a landing-place,

Mr. Barry said, instances of such were very common in Rome, and other parts of Italy. The Palace at Caserta was an instance of a similar architectural arrangement; and the Scala Reggia, in the Vatican, had forty steps in one flight.

But we have not more space at present to devote to this subject, suffice it to say that the Committee came to a resolution to the effect that Mr. Barry had not authority to make certain alterations which he made in carrying out the details of the original plan approved of by the Commissioners of Woods.

Mr. Barry said, at the close of the proceedings, that he would be prepared, if necessary, to defend himself for all he had done to the Board of Works.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

The Vernon, 80, Captain W. Walpole, which has been for some years employed in the Mediterranean, was paid off this week at Sheerness.

The Vulture, steam-frigate, is all ready for the pendant, at Sheerness; and the Firebrand steam-frigate, at Portsmouth, is also ready. They will both be commissioned in a few days.

The Dee, steam troop-ship, Master Commander Thomas Driver, has arrived in the river from Cork. She touched at Portsmouth on her passage.

The Prometheus steam-sloop, Commander John Hay, has been ordered to be expedited in her equipment for service, and will as soon as ready, be despatched to join the squadron on the African coast, under the command of Captain Jones, of her Majesty's ship Penelope.

The Janus, steam-sloop, built at Chatham by the Earl of Dundonald, is being fitted with her engines and boilers, and will, as soon as is ready, try her capabilities in the river. The novelty of her construction, her bend and stern being alike, so that she can proceed either way without the necessity of turning, has caused her to be looked upon with some interest. Her gallant constructor appears to have every confidence in her perfectly succeeding when tried.

The Collingwood, 80, Capt. H. Eden, is progressing very rapidly in her equipment, and is entering her hands very fast. She has already between four and five hundred men on board, including her marines. Sir George Seymour has not yet hoisted his flag, but is expected to do so in the course of next week.

Dr. Robert Clarke has been appointed to Plymouth Hospital.

It is stated that the reason why several vessels have been so suddenly ordered to Guernsey with troops is in consequence of anticipated disturbances arising from the misunderstanding which has been some time existing between the civil and military authorities of the island. The present Lieutenant-Governor, Major-General Napier, has attempted to put a stop to some of the flagrant abuses in the administration of justice with which he has become cognisant, and by so doing has incurred the most bitter displeasure of the members of the royal court of Guernsey. It appears that the constitution of this court is such, that under its jurisdiction the greatest partiality occurs, and frequently a native of the island, however heinous and evidential the offence, is allowed to escape scot-free, whilst strangers, and especially the soldiers quartered in the island, have been treated with unmerited severity.

Chatham, April 30.—Colonel Sir Thomas Willshire, K.C.B., Commandant of this Garrison, issued this day the following garrison order:—" Commanding Colonel Thomas Wearr, K.H., to hold the undermentioned detachments of the Provisional Battalion, in readiness to embark at Chatham on board of the vessel of war, lying at Gravesend, for the Presidency of Madras:—The 4th, King's Own, 109 privates, with Lieutenants Holton and Kenigh Collins; 18 privates, with Lieutenant Kemp, of the 11th, and Assistant Surgeon Weinton, of the 4th; making a total of 4 officers and 120 men, who are ordered to embark on board the ship Claudine, on Saturday, the 25th instant. The following will embark the regiments in the undermentioned order:—First, the 63rd Regiment, 94th, need hardly be stated that the difficulty of checking the recoil attending the heavy charge necessary for such a piece is even greater than that of moving the gun, and here again mechanical skill has triumphed to all appearance over the supposed insuperable difficulty. The ordinary breeching is entirely dispensed with, and the recoil is checked by opposing a gradually increasing friction to the carriage on which the gun is mounted. The means employed for this purpose exhibit a happy application of one of the fundamental principles of mechanics—that of the inclined plane, in connection with the laws of friction; and so successfully has this principle been applied, that although the friction apparatus, at the termination of the recoil of the gun, becomes what is technically called rammed, with a force perhaps of many millions of pounds, yet by slightly touching a lever, it becomes instantly disengaged, leaving the gun and carriage perfectly free. A contrivance having the same object in view is applied to the carronades, which in them also dispenses with the ordinary breeching.

In connexion with the Stockton guns, besides the carriage, &c., of which they have spoken, your Committee have to notice two other contrivances. Of these, the first is a lock so constructed that it is discharged at any desired elevation, without human interference, by a peculiar mechanism, to which the law of gravitation, in connection with the rolling of the vessel, is rendered subservient to this purpose. The second contrivance referred to is an instrument to measure distances, by which the requisite elevation to be given to the gun may be instantly determined.

The heaviest of the Stockton guns was forged in the city of New York, by Messrs. Ward and Co., and was bored and finished by Messrs. Rogg and Delamater, of the Phœnix Foundry. It was composed entirely of American iron.

The Princeton is sparred and rigged in the ordinary manner of sloops of war. The cabins are arranged in a very neat and tasteful manner.

ENCLOSURE OF HAMPSTEAD-HEATH.

We perceive, with regret, that the unpopular attempts for the enclosure of Hampstead-heath have just been renewed. Sir Thomas Maryon Wilson, the proprietor, has just presented to Parliament an "Estate Bill," which is, to all intents and purposes, an Enclosure Bill, allowing now open lands to be let for years, and to be built upon. Sir Thomas Wilson first introduced into Parliament, a bill for the enclosure of the Heath, so long ago as in 1829, and though signally defeated, he has frequently renewed the attempt to deprive the public, but more especially the Londoners, of this picturesque resort for their recreation. Last year, Sir Thomas's measure was promptly rejected, and, we trust, this year, it will meet with the same fate. The bill, when presented to the House of Lords, on the 17th inst., was, as a matter of course, read the first time: it now stands for second reading, but no day has been named. Meanwhile, the impending measure should be closely watched, as Sir Thomas Wilson and his friends have long declared that the measure should be constantly renewed, until Parliament would be at last "tired out." We have had Select Committees of the House of Commons, "to consider the best means of securing open spaces in the vicinity of populous towns, as public walks and places of exercise, calculated to promote the health and comfort of the inhabitants;" and we hope that every friend of this perfectly legitimate object for the interference of the state will lose no opportunity of opposing this odious Enclosure Bill, and its "not very modest renewal."

Hampstead is equi-distant with Highgate (four miles) N. from London; the high ground of both places consists of Bagshot sand, a marine formation, covering the London clay. Hampstead Heath is, unquestionably, the most picturesque portion of the environs of London. The election of members of Parliament for Middlesex was usually held on the Heath, from the time of King Charles II. till 1701, when the first announcement appears of its taking place at Brentford: and while it was a place of fashionable resort, races were held here. The royal forest of Middlesex formerly covered this part of the county, in which the citizens of London had right of free chace, confirmed by several regal charters, and in which privilege originated the civic office of common hunt, now abolished. The remains of this forest are still to be seen in Ken Wood, the beautiful seat of the Earl of Mansfield. Sir Thomas Wroth had a grant of the manor of Hampstead, in 1550; John Wroth, his descendant, sold it to Sir Baptist Hickes in 1620; and it was purchased in 1707 by Sir William Langhorne, Bart., from whom the property has descended, through the family of Maryon, to Sir Thomas Maryon Wilson, of Charlton, in Kent, the present owner. Upon the crown of the Heath is the tavern, Jack Straw's Castle, the loftiest site near the metropolis; 443 feet above the level of the Thames, or 36 feet higher than the cross of St. Paul's.

Before the commencement of the last century, Hampstead became a popular resort for its wells, the water of which was sold in flasks. Concerts and balls, held weekly at the principal tavern, were then the fun. At the upper Flask Inn, about the same time, were kept the summer meetings of the celebrated Kit Cat Club.

We are not aware of the precise extent of Hampstead Heath: in Lysons' "Environs" the parish is stated at 2169 acres; the waste, at 273 acres. "A Resident and Constant Reader, W. R.," has favoured us with the following glance at the noble prospects from this celebrated resort:—

"Will you allow me for a short time to direct your attention (so ably bestowed on other places) to the landscapes and unrivalled views of Hampstead, which exceed those of Windsor or Richmond. On the south, it commands the metropolis, with its thousand sail of ships, flanked by the Kent and Surrey hills; on the west, Harrow-on-the-Hill, and, when clear, Windsor Castle. In the evening nothing can surpass the effect of the setting of the sun. To the north, on the beautiful hills, lay Stanmore and Bushey; on the east, Highgate, Hornsey, and Epping Forest, with a bird's-eye view of the county of Essex, to the sea. The localities are far too numerous to mention. The church is a fine object; nor should I forget the holly hedge, planted by Lord Chancellor Erskine, near the 'Two Spaniards,' wont to be, in by-gone days, the house of call for Jonathan Wild, and gentlemen of his profession. Then, the mineral waters, particularly that in Well-walk, as salubrious as ever, now seldom drank, hardly known, forsaken for some more distant, not so good. The Vale of Health, looking to it over the pond from the east, as a beautiful retreat. Artists and botanists in no small number this summer have been very busy on the Heath for some time."

We may add that Hampstead has been the retreat of many men of letters: midway between the village and Camden-town, on Haverstock-hill, is a cottage (now divided) wherein Sir Charles Sedley died, and whence Steele dated many "Spectators" and "Tatlers" opposite, Mother, or Moll King built three houses; and in a small villa behind them, lived her favourite pupil, Nancy Dawson. In Steele's days, Hampstead was the resort of wits: in his cottage an apartment was called "the Philosopher's Room," probably that in which he wrote; and in Hogarth's "March to Finch.ey," the cottage and Mother King's house are seen in the distance. At Holybush-hill, Steevens, the editor of Shakspeare, lived; and it is singular that upon the "sister hill," Highgate, Charles Knight planned and executed his "Pictorial Edition of Shakspeare."

NEW CHURCH, GRAVESEND.

The great extension of the town of Gravesend having demanded the erection of an additional church, the eastern suburb, or that which lies in the parish of Milton, has been chosen for its site. The foundation stone of the new edifice (to be dedicated to the Holy Trinity), was laid on the 14th instant, by the Archdeacon of Rochester, in the presence of several of the neighbouring clergy and gentry, and a large concourse of spectators. The church will be built of rag stone, with Caen stone dressings, in the decorated English style of the fourteenth century, from the designs of Mr. James Wilson, of Bath and London. The plan is cruciform, measuring from east to west, 87 feet (not including the chancel); and from north to south of the transept, 70 feet; width of nave, 32 feet; chancel, 20, by 27 feet. The tower is at the south-west angle, and measures, to the top of the spire, 130 feet.

NEW CHURCH, MILTON-NEXT-GRAVESEND.

The roof will be open, with spandrils and tracery. The church will be fitted up with benches, and, with the seats in the galleries of the transepts, will accommodate 1000 persons, 600 of which are to be free. The expense to complete the edifice in the best manner will cost £4000.

PARLIAMENTARY PORTRAITS.—No. XIX.

THE MARQUIS OF CLANRICARDE.

The Marquis of Clanricarde, the subject of our present sketch, is a scion of the powerful family of the De Burghs—a name prominent in the list of the Norman invaders of Ireland, which was a kind of continuation of the Invasion of England by the same race. The family name of the race was then De Bourgo, mentioned by Campbell in his "O'Connor's Child,"—one of the most beautiful of his poems—as "De Bourgo's chivalry." The conquerors became settlers, and the family is now considered an Irish one, though the present Marquis sits in the House of Lords as Baron Somerhill, which is, we believe, an English title. The Burkes form a numerous sept in Ireland, and are traced back to the same source, though most of them have succeeded to nothing belonging to the family but the name. The Marquis of Clanricarde is a liberal, ranking with the Normanbys and Fortescues in politics, and distinguished among his fellow peers by the zeal with which he contends against the governing of Ireland on party and factious, instead of national principles. To go over the list of debates in which he has placed himself in direct opposition to the present Government would be tedious, but the last occasion occurred a fortnight since; on the Monday evening, he brought forward a motion on the nomination of a Mr. O'Brien to the situation of a Stipendiary Magistrate in Ireland, to the effect "That the appointment to the office of stipendiary magistrate in Ireland of a person who has published intemperate and violent expressions of extreme opinions upon those political questions which agitate the public mind of that country is not calculated to maintain confidence in that steady and impartial administration of justice which it should be the object of such appointments to ensure." Mr. O'Brien was once a Repealer of the most extreme complexion, not stopping much short of bloodshed; and by that virulence he did not make himself very acceptable as an ally to Mr. O'Connell. Meeting with rather a cold reception in this quarter, he turned round and denounced Repeal and its champion as strongly as he had before supported both. In this recantation he was rewarded with the post of stipendiary magistrate, and in that post he bids fair to continue, notwithstanding the exertions of the noble marquis, his motion having been negatived without a division.

The Marquis of Clanricarde is forty-two years of age, tall in person, and older looking than he really is, in consequence of his baldness. He married the daughter of the gifted George Canning, and has been engaged in public life as Ambassador to the Court of St. Petersburgh, where his Liberalism must, we think, have been rather out of place. He is Lord-Lieutenant of the County of Galway, and patron of nine livings in the church.

LAYING THE FOUNDATION-STONE OF THE GIRLS' SCHOOL, CALEDONIAN ASYLUM.

THE CALEDONIAN ASYLUM.

On Friday, the 10th, the ceremony of laying the foundation-stone of the building intended for the Girls' School connected with this excellent institution took place on the site in Copenhagen Fields. The Directors of the charity have had it in contemplation for some years past to admit girls as well as boys to the benefits of the institution; but want of funds prevented their carrying this benevolent purpose into effect. However, through the munificence of Mr. Matheson, M.P. for Ashburton, who has subscribed £1000 expressly for enlarging the building for the reception of girls, and by subscriptions on the part of the friends of the charity, the Directors have been enabled to proceed with the good work of extension; and they expect that in the course of the autumn the building will be opened for the admission of girls who are descendants of Scottish parents.

At the ceremony, on Friday, the Earl of Zetland, Grand Master of the Freemasons of England, attended by a large body of the fraternity, in the costume of their respective lodges; the Highland Society of London, also in full Highland costume; the Caledonian Society, the Vice-Presidents, Directors, and Governors of the Caledonian Asylum, went in grand procession from Copenhagen House to the site of the intended building, on an adjoining height, and the foundation-stone was laid with masonic honours.

The company afterwards adjourned to a banquet provided at the Freemasons' Tavern, in Great Queen-street, by Mr. Bacon, where nearly 300 sat down to dinner. The chair was taken by the Duke of Buccleuch, besides whom, and the Earl of Zetland, there were present, Mr. Matheson, Captain C. Forbes, General Sir F. Maclean, Sir J. Kirkland, Mr. A. Rose, Mr. Gillespie, Mr. G. Forbes, Mr. Tulloch, General Aitcheson, and Sir R. Hunter, Bart. The usual loyal, national, and local toasts having been drunk with the honours, and the company addressed by the Chairman in support and advocacy of the institution, a liberal contribution, both towards the funds of the institution and towards the building-fund for the schools was announced by the Secretary.

PARASELENÆ, NEAR NOTTINGHAM.

(From a Correspondent.)

On Wednesday, the 1st of May, at 11h. 10m., P.M., a curious phenomenon was witnessed at High Field House, which is situated about two miles and a half south-west of Nottingham.

The day had been very fine and hot, the maximum thermometer in the shade 69·30 degrees, in the sun 91 degrees. The barometer at 11, P.M., was rising, and had reached 30·722 inches; wind, a slight breeze from east. At 11, P.M., I noticed the sky, and also five minutes afterwards, but nothing uncommon appeared. Few cirri, of a very electric nature, converged towards S.; a colourless lunar halo, of about 23 degrees in diameter, and a lunar burr were visible.

11h. 10m. The sky was cloudless, except a portion from S.E. to S.W., extending nearly to the zenith, which had cirri thinly dispersed over it, and on a lower level were a few cumulostrati clouds, all converging towards S.; at this hour a most rare and beautiful phenomenon took place. A brilliant mock-moon, a a, of a silvery tint, shone out of the lunar halo, b b, on the west side, a little below the horizontal level of the moon. Also three arcs of inverted rainbows, c c, d d, and e e, appeared; the first c c, within the lunar halo, b b, and nearly at the highest part of it, which cut off upwards of 27 degrees from the halo; the second, d d, rested on the summit of the lunar halo, the circumference of which was about 28 degrees; and the third, e e, about 10 degrees higher, whose circumference was 57 degrees. All these arcs of inverted rainbows or segments of circles opened in a direction to the N.

11h. 13m. At the points where the inverted rainbow, c c, cut the halo, b b, were two silvery oval flames, f f and g g, which were evidently paraselenæ. About 10 degrees higher than the inverted rainbow, e e, was a complete circle, h h, whose diameter was nearly 8 degrees (thus extended to the zenith), having Cor Caroli in the centre of the circle. (The circle, h h, and also the inverted rainbows, were due N. from the moon.)

11h. 15m. Mock-moon, a a, and also inverted rainbow, c c, disappeared; the circles, b b and h h, and inverted rainbows, d d and e e, were still brilliant.

11h. 20m. The phenomenon had vanished, except the lunar halo and burr, which disappeared at half-past 11 o'clock. (On the lunar halo b b, opposite to the mock-moon a a, some cumulostrati clouds rested, which, if there had been a mock-moon, would have been sufficient to have hidden it from our sight.) This phenomenon did not re-appear; no prismatic colours were exhibited during this very rare paraselenæ, which, I think, is usual during these extraordinary appearances. It may be as well to add, the weather for the last fortnight had been very fine, and the sky nearly cloudless; but, for a few evenings previous, the distant prospect had been remarkably clear.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, MAY 25, 1844.

SIR ROBERT PEEL'S Bank Charter resolutions were re-discussed on Monday night; the debate was commenced by the author of the charges, who thought it might be convenient to the house if he should explain some points of detail connected with the plan, and state some modifications of the plan itself, which, however, are but slight, and in no degree affecting the principle of the measure. For these slight changes we refer the reader to our Parliamentary report. The favours with which the plan has been received renders any opposition to it out of the question. Men of all parties have united in their commendation of it; and even Mr. Muntz cannot find so much fault with it as might have been expected. Does this unanimity arise from a general knowledge of the question at issue? Do members approve because they recognise the skill of the financier, or do they give their approbation in a trustful ignorance, that, knowing nothing, is inclined to hope for all things? That there are two sides to this, as to every other question, there can be no manner of doubt; but as the speakers on it are few, and they all take the view advocated by the Premier, it is to be presumed that this "other side" has not been much studied by any one. That a paper currency must be a convertible one, and that every body issuing what are representatives of money must be compelled to give gold for those "promises to pay" at any time it may be demanded, is a plain, sound principle, the action of which, if in the slightest degree doubted, would destroy all faith in "paper" of every kind. Any system, then, that does not rigorously insist on this convertibility we hold to be mere quackery. Credit cannot be made to do the work of bond fide capital, unless there is actual value at the back of it. In the general recognition of this principle by all parties, lies the complete success of Sir Robert Peel's plan. So perfect and so general is the approval it has met, that there are not the slightest signs of any opposition to it, still less of any opposition that can prevent or retard the operation of any part of it. There is a general indisposition to enter into the intricacies of the question, and, we may add, an inability to do it that is quite as general as the indisposition. Every one knows what he earns and what he spends; every one can manage his individual portion of the currency with a prudence greater or less as the case may be; but when any one comes to reflect on the whole currency of the empire, his individual experience gives him no means of judging as to its operation. The difference between the portion and the mass, is like the disproportion between a glass of water taken from the ocean and the vast ocean itself. It were as easy to judge of the tides of the Atlantic, by the imperceptible fraction drawn from its waters, as to decide on the laws that govern the currency of the kingdom, by the circumstances which affect individual transactions. The present plan is but the natural consequence of the bill of 1819; and unless results are produced at once disastrous and distinctly to be traced to it, the question may be considered as settled. We firmly believe that the general opinion of the people, according to which a Government must act, is in favour of the bullion system, not of the paper, and that the discontent and fears of those who advocate a larger and freer issue of paper, are considered to be the fears of a few theorists, which have at present no effect whatever on public opinion. The currency question is evidently settled for the next ten years, and to the events of that period it must be left to determine whether it is bad or good; at present we are inclined to believe it sound, and calculated to inspire confidence; nor is it extensive enough to make any perceptible change in the system under which we have bought and sold and produced, enriched, and exported, and toiled, and suffered—as men under any system must toil and suffer—for the last quarter of a century.

IT is possible for a good thing to be done at a bad time; and a virtuous action may be performed ungraciously. The mismanagement that delayed the "Clontarf" proclamation till the very last moment it was possible to issue it, was nearly the cause of bloodshed. The neglect or supineness of the Government let a quasi rebellion come almost to a head, and then discovered suddenly that what it had tolerated was an illegality. We are not comparing great things with small when we say that the "proclamation" of Sir J. Graham, against the gambling at Epsom Races, has been issued much in the same hasty manner, and had not the police been strong, and the booth-keepers patient, there might have been broken heads here too. As it happened, all passed off quietly, and many a denizen of Cockaigne returned to town plus the cash that, but for the zeal of Sir J. Graham, he would have dropped in these canvass temples of Fortune, under the excitement of hazard and champagne. We have nothing to say against the suppression of these deas of iniquity; but the risk of collision might as well have been avoided, as well as the offensive and ostentatious parade of a large body of police on the ground, creating disagreeable apprehensions in the well-disposed, that a row or a riot of some kind was to be expected. The gambling was an abuse; but it was one, as the present Solicitor-General says, "so consecrated by time," as almost to have become a matter of course. Moreover, the managers of the races and the owners of the ground profited by it, receiving large sums in the shape of rent, &c.; all this was permitted as usual; the money was paid by the speculators in the attendance of the two things that are said to be soon parted; the bribes were taken by those who have the permissive power; the places were built; and then—and not till then—their vocation was prohibited by the fiat of the Home Secretary. Now, having fostered a bad system, we have scarcely a right to punish those who pursue it more severely than is necessary for the prevention of the abuse; and that might have been as effectually done, and with less risk, by a more timely notice. This we should have recommended as a matter of policy; we also think those who have received the money of these harpies are bound in common honesty to refund it. For the rest, we confess we have no sort of care or concern for the disappointment of these sharks; we would give them what they seldom gave others—fairplay; but beyond tha. they must expect nothing. Having "fluttered the Volsces" in St. James's, by a visitation from the police, it was only consistent to carry out the work at Epsom; as noblemen and gentlemen do not keep migratory gaming-tables, the House of Commons need not apprehend any application for a bill of "indemnity" from the "legs." Such privileges and immunities are confined to those who gamble with horses and not with dice, so that however the inferior sharpers may resemble their betters in principle, they will find in practice that the odds are much against them. Gentlemen are released from the penalties that are the consequences of "sport"—those who are emphatically no gentlemen, must grin and abide. The police, we may observe, exceeded their instructions, as they are pretty sure to do, and made a crusade against every kind of amusement, with a dogged kind of virtuous stupidity that could not condescend to draw distinctions between chance and skill. The disappointment of the boys and great children was intense on finding that they could not have a "shy" at the time-honoured sticks with the tin tobacco-boxes on the top of them, without coming under the ban of the Secretary of State! The energy of the police on this subject was exceedingly amusing; the five hundred police seemed to have nothing to do but to suppress the alarming indications in the juveniles of the mobility to indulge in "three throws a penny."

fying to his friends, and to every one connected with the appointment, that there appeared to be but one unanimous voice in the country as to the eligibility of the individual who had been selected at once by the Government and the Court of Directors. He (the Chairman) felt that on this new appointment their distinguished guest would add to his already brilliant reputation, and he could assure him that the Court of Directors placed the greatest confidence in his judgment, that they were prepared to give him the most cordial support, and that they had selected him from a confidence not only in his abilities, but in the justice, the generosity, and benevolence of his heart. (Cheers.) They felt persuaded that while he maintained the supremacy of British power, he would take delight in furthering the happiness of the people of India, and it was their and his (the Chairman's) earnest desire that his gallant friend, after a long career of useful services in India, would live to return to his native country, and receive from the good wishes and blessings of the entire people of India. (Loud cheers.) He would conclude by giving them "The health of Sir H. Hardinge, the Governor-General of India." The toast was drunk with three times three and loud cheers.

Sir H. Hardinge rose and said, that in acknowledging the compliment which had just been paid, he would at once say that he felt deeply impressed with the importance of the trust which had been confided to him. He begged to offer to the Chairman and the Court of Directors his most grateful acknowledgments for their conduct in selecting him for so high a trust, and also to the company around for the manner in which they had received his health. The assurance which they had just heard from the Chairman, that his appointment had been unanimously approved of by the Court, and that he might expect their most cordial support, was most gratifying to him, not on account of his private feelings, but because he felt assured that that support would give him in the performance of his duty more weight and authority. From them he had the advice and assistance of many well-versed in Indian affairs, along with which he had the consent of his colleagues, and, he trusted, he might add, the approbation of his gracious Sovereign. These evidences of favour and confidence should not be slighted by him. He was fully aware of the difficulties of the task he had undertaken, and of his own deficiency. He doubted whether he should be able to fulfil all the hopes which had been so confidently expressed, but he knew that in his new capacity he would receive the assistance of the most able men in the civil service of this country; that he would be guided by the local knowledge and experience of the Court of Directors, and instructed by his noble friend who presided at the Board of Control. Above all, and it was to him an advantage inclalculable and invaluable, he would on all occasions of difficulty be able to refer for advice and assistance to his illustrious friend and predecessor, the Duke of Wellington. (Loud cheers). When the proposal was first made to him (Sir H. Hardinge) his first inquiry was, what was the opinion of the illustrious Duke, and when he was informed that his grace approved of the appointment, he (Sir H. Hardinge, entertained some hope that the expectations of the Court of Directors and of his right hon. friend the Prime Minister, would not be entirely disappointed. (Hear, hear.) For he had passed the greatest part of his public life under the eye and instructions of that illustrious commander. He had had the honour of serving throughout the Peninsular war under his command; and after the peace he had been selected by his grace to conduct the business of the military department in the House of Commons; subsequently to fill the office of Secretary at War, and afterwards that of Chief Secretary for Ireland. He mentioned these facts to show how well he was aware of the value of such unbounded confidence, and how much he owed to the counsels and countenance of such a man. (Hear, hear.) He, (Sir H. Hardinge) hoped that in any arrangements he might undertake respecting the great and gallant Indian army, he might be allowed to promote the advantage of the whole country and the welfare of the entire population. It was true that a large portion of his life had been passed in military avocations, but he was free to confess that that fact was a guarantee that his proposed measures were by no means warlike. On the contrary, he was a decided lover of peace. (Loud cheers.) He might venture to say that he knew too well the miseries, he would not say the vicissitudes, of war. No, under his illustrious chief he had never known its harassing vicissitudes, for he had been one career of uninterrupted victory. (Loud cheers.) Having made this declaration, he rejoiced that he might turn his attention to that great and gallant army who were employed in the service of the Honourable Company, composed as it was of Europeans and natives, who knew no other rivalry but a friendly competition as to who performed their duty best. (Hear hear.) If on this point he needed any advice to whom could he refer more qualified to give it than to the conqueror of Assaye, he who had so often led the Indian army to victory, and had at their head laid the foundation of that transcendant fame which was now extended over the civilized world. (Hear, hear.) He (Sir H. Hardinge) might now be permitted to mention that the recent successes of the Indian army under Generals Pollock, Nott, and Sale, had proved that in all the high qualities for which that army was distinguished, the fire of it in no way deteriorated. In every success of theirs he should take the deepest interest, but he trusted that their end and aim would be lasting peace, and the amelioration and improvement of the moral state of the people of India. (Hear, hear.) These were the points to which he should most anxiously turn his attention, and if one consideration more than another could stimulate him in exertion, it would be a hope to lay on a wide and peaceful foundation the happiness and prosperity of the whole people of India. (Hear.) Tranquility was now restored in every part of India save the Punjaub, and he should, therefore, go out to the East in the hope of maintaining it, and securing that settlement which had always been shown by the people of India to the sovereignty of Great Britain. These were his impressions of his duty, and if Providence should only bless his efforts, he should be happy to give his humble duty in the united service of England and of India. (The right hon. baronet resumed his seat amidst loud cheering.)

The next toast was "The Navy."

The Earl of Hadcongton returned thanks.

The Chairman then said that the company would admit that they had every reason to be proud of the army, and to be grateful to those men who were always ready to maintain the reputation of that army in every quarter of the globe. By none were the services of the army more justly appreciated than by the India Company, who felt justly proud of the high honour they enjoyed in commanding its illustrious chief. (The rest of the sentence was lost in the loud and general cheering which followed the allusion to the Duke of Wellington.) Yes, the East India company looked back with delight and pride to the time when the Duke of Wellington led the Indian army to victory, in the early dawn of that fame which now left him without a rival. He (the Chairman) felt unable fully to express his feelings on the present occasion, but he trusted they would not be censured, if he should drink "The Duke of Wellington's health, and many long life to him and the Army."

The toast was received with loud and long-continued cheering.

The Duke of Wellington returned thanks, and concluded by congratulating the company on their select on.

The Chairman—"The health of Sir Robert Peel and her Majesty's Ministers." (Cheers.)

Sir R. Peel returned thanks, and in the course of his observations made the following remarks, with regard to the differences that recently existed between the Government and the East India Company on the subject of Lord Ellenborough's recal. "Gentlemen, in the administration of the compacted affairs of that great empire, it cannot be expected that there should not be occasional differences of opinion among those entrusted with their administration; but I trust that those differences, when, unfortunately, they do exist, will never make us forget the responsibility devolving on all parties concerned in the government of India, nor make us unmindful of the immense importance of uniting cordially in furtherance of the interests of that country. ("Hear," and cheers.) Gentlemen, I consider that we, her Majesty's servants, have reason to be proud to pos s a power as great as we could give, of the deep interest we feel in the welfare of India, and our anxiety to promote it. For the services of that country we have consented to sever the connection we have had with a member of the Royal family, who, as a colleague, is entitled to our entire confidence, and who has our esteem and affectionate regard as a private friend. (Loud cheers.) We have consented in part with a colleague who, as a soldier, has his name identified with Corunna and Albuera, and the whole Peninsular campaign, and who closed his military career on the plains of Waterloo. (Hear.) We have consented to part with a colleague who, in the administration of civil functions, has displayed such a rare combination of temper, firmness of resolution, and of moral courage, as has confirmed and increased those claims upon the gratitude of his country which his military exploits had created. (Cheers.) Gentlemen, we have made this sacrifice in the firm belief that no man was better qualified for the great trust than my right hon. friend, and on the part of my colleagues I join in the earnest and sincere prayer which has been expressed, that my right hon. friend may be spared under the blessing of Providence, my right hon. friend may find compensation for the sacrifices he has made for the good of his country, and that his services in India being performed, he may return to his native land, having added to the fame which he has already acquired. That he may return to enjoy the retrospect of his conduct after having consolidated our connection with that country, and promote the happiness of the millions who there live under our rule. (Hear, hear.) That he will return to justify the confidence reposed in him by the Crown, by the servants of the Crown, and that many of us may live to see the day when we shall bail with delight his return to this country after a long, prosperous, and successful career in India." (Loud cheers.)

The Chairman then gave "The Earl of Ripon and the Board of Control," at the same time regretting the absence of the noble lord and its cause, which he understood was indisposition.

The Duke of Buccleuch returned thanks, and concluded by giving the health of "The Chairman."

The Chairman returned thanks.

Several other toasts were then disposed of, and the company separated at an early hour.

THE WEST INDIA COLONIES.

On Tuesday afternoon a meeting of the planters, merchants, and others interested in the British West India colonies, was held at Willis's Rooms, Kingstreet, St. James's, for the purpose of considering the Legislative measures and conduction being made in the duties upon sugar, coffee, and cocoa, which shall not embrace similar reductions in the British West India productions. The large room was crowded with many of the most other gentlemen particularly interested in the trade carried on in the West Indies.

Lord Viscount Combermere filled the chair.

A number of resolutions were moved and seconded by various noblemen and gentlemen present, after which a petition to both Houses of Parliament, embodying the resolutions, was agreed upon to be presented, and Viscount St. Vincent being requested to present it to the Lords and Mr. P. Miles to the Commons, thanks were voted to the noble chairman, and the business of the meeting terminated.

RAC-Y LINES ON A PIC-NIC AT EPSOM DOWNS.

WRITTEN SUR LE CHAMP!

O! Epsom Downs! have ye no trees,
B[illegible] under our "Gabs"! to shelter us?—
W[illegible] "Warren" (?) here some warming breese,
Not one that would quite sweiter us,—
B[illegible]t such as those half-geild things
Partaking Summer's heat with Spring's
Ambrosia! coolness, while we spread—
O[illegible] Pic Nic at—so much a head.
O! Epsom Downs! ye Ups and Downs!
Of many a reckless—thoughtless rake—

VIEW OF THE WARREN.

We come [illegible]
Of Chance, but for Enjoyment's sake!
We bring good store of pigeon pie
Not made of birds that homeward fly
To tell the fame of the run—
Their task is care, but our's is fun!

Oh! Epsom Downs! a running brook
The Poet's eye doth charm of course—
But we find greater joy to look
On what?—upon a running horse!
And then to turn when he is past
To bright champagne, and see it glass'd
To all around—oh! happy cheer
Though it be only once a year!

But Epsom Downs! the getting home
Is Pleasure's antidote and bane
(As hath been said ere now by some,)
To be jamm'd up in that deep lane
Near Tattenham corner is a bore
The mind most patent can't get o'er—
And then to have your nag break down
Leander-like!—How get to town!

THE BETTING RING.

THE DERBY.

o ccurr ur
—— venit—victoria læta? – HORAT.

A glorious, fresh young summer day drew, on Wednesday last, as goodly a company to the pleasant downs of Surrey as have foregathered there for many a year. It was, in fact, just such a anniversary as that of which, some time since, we sung in some such strain as this :—

We're off to the races
With smiles on our faces,
Lobster salads, and champagne and cha
Prime Newcastle salmon,
And Westphalia hammon:
There is no mistake about that.

All the world and his mother
Are joining each other;
City madams are "cutting it fat"
In silks, with their spouses
In white hats and "blouses,"
And no mistake about that.

Drags, so-carts, and chaises,
Are flying like blazes:
Prize, prince, lenry and flat,
Oriental pretenders,
And "all up" West-enders,
And no mistake about that.

See! the Downs spread before us—
Sweet saints! what a chorus—
"Darling Caroline!" "Have a brush for your hat!"
Noble soldiers and seamen,
But they've eh seled the "peamen,"
And no mistake about that.

If Fortune was in her
Kind mood, and a winner
You come off, don't book the thing pat.
Only if the men "stump up,
Why then ye may jump up,
For there is no mistake about that.

But if lost is your rhino,
The only thing I know,
Is to render forthwith cavam "Tatt;"
And fork out instanter,
Or you're a "levanter,"
And no mistake about that.

Such was the scene and its philosophy; all that could make it what it has long been, and long may it so continue, a festival without its fellow on the round earth.

Our artist, it will be seen, has been again making up his book on the field, and we trust not unsuccessfully, in endeavouring to perpetuate the celebrity of this great national event, and although he who engraves and draws "Running Rein," is only "a hewer of wood and a drawer of water," after all, yet he does quite as much as James II., for the greatest efforts of that monarch's existence was, to preserve even a running rein. We beg our friend Punch's pardon, and that of all other professional punsters, for thus trespassing on their domain, and if they only promise not to punish us for our presumption, we will take care in future not to be guilty of a similar offence.

We were last year so discursive in our illustrat ons and descriptions of the Derby—its saddling, and mounting, and starting, and running, and rubb ng and settling—that we really apprehend the danger of incurring a charge of want of originality, by going over the same ground again. To say that the day was fine, the roads dusty, the company numerous, the champagne plenty, and the racing first-rate, would be, in effect, to state all that was worthy of observation; for, bar the accidents, there was hardly a single incident that requires the speciality of a separate notice. Thanks to Sir James Graham (and doubtless to his colleague Lord Stanley, who had always a dislike for the game) thimble-rigging of every description was strictly prohibited; and, as a matter of course, there was a proportionate retirement of the fun in which ill-natured people used to indulge at seeing peculiarly green gentlemen done brown. It was rumoured on Tuesday, that it was the intention of the professional gamblers to kick up a riot and stop the racing on the following day; but the police had mustered in such significant force, that the vindictive design, if ever it existed, was very speedily abandoned. The muttered curses of the hell-kites at the sudden sanctimoniousness of the Home Secretary were not only loud but becomingly deep, and all appeared to agree in the opinion that no roads are so rough as those that have just been mended. At an early hour in the morning a number of discontented looking Israelites were employed in striking their tents, whilst an equally numerous portion of the Christian community betrayed the most unhappy concern at the ruthless innovation on their former customs and habits. The police, however, looked cool and determined, and hush-money being a thing as unavailing as unnecessary, the sounds of "Roulette," "make your game, gentlemen," "the ball's off," ceased, shall we add for ever, on Epsom Downs. On our arrival on the Downs, we were struck by the absence of the usual four-in-hands which formerly used to deck the sides of the course; but we subsequently discovered that this aristocratic portion of the crowd had established a colony on the hill, where, no doubt, they found themselves more secure against the impertinent inquisitiveness of vulgar curiosity which never fails to become excited by the ride-like noises of the champagne sharp-shooters, and the contagious exhilaration that it produces.

The police were exceedingly civil and the crowd well conducted, and we learn that the proprietors of the refreshment booths reaped an unusually abundant harvest. We will now proceed to give an account of the race, as it is unnecessary to give any detailed description of our engravings, which, we have no doubt, will speak for themselves.

The scene on the road, the Warren, and the Betting Ring, will be recognised by all who have ever been to Epsom on the Derby-day as faithful delineations of these stirring localities. The portrait of the winner is by Herring—a sufficient warrant for its fidelity.

But our present affair is with the Derby—symptoms of so many hopes and fears—Midas-fingered, turning to gold bits of paper, whereon the name of the winner shall be inserted and drawn by the men of enterprise and spirit who patronise the system of "sweeps." The field consisted of nine-and-twenty, selected, in reference to certain outsiders, at the last moment, and proud in certain two favourites backed to beat the whole 153 during the last half year. Now, an anxious tryst is the starting post, where scrutiny exhausts itself in measuring thews and sinews, and every one is satisfied that the horse, or horses he has backed, will win. When the rush broke up—for the last time—ominous occasion! the state of the odds stood thus :—

5 to 1 agst The Ugly Buck	20 to 1 agst Orlando
3 to 1 —— Ratan	20 to 1 —— Akbar
10 to 1 —— Running Rein	20 to 1 —— Qui Tam
14 to 1 —— Leander	20 to 1 —— Bay Momus
15 to 1 —— Ionian

and fancy prices about the others. The history of the race is soon written; would that its fate admitted of a like facility of interpretation. The third attempt got the lot off, and the two favourites went away in front with the running, which they carried on to the Mile Post. There they were beaten, and it was taken up by Running Rein, with Colonel Peel's nerves and Leander handy; one half the field beaten off before they reached the summit of the hill, as they rounded Tattenham corner. Many, who was ruling Running Rein with great care, was well clear of everything, and Leander was crossing towards the leader, when, in crossing the road, he fell, and broke one of his hind legs, and it was all over with him. No other change of account took place to the end, when Running Rein obtained a clever winner by three-fourths of a length; Orlando second; Ionian third; Bay Momus fourth; Qui Tam fifth; and Ratan seventh.

Thus it hath been shewn how the race was run—"concurrit:—venit victoria læta!" Ah! there is the rub. Previous to the race, lots of protests were made against the winner and Leander, each of which was suspected of coquetting about his age, and after it, Colonel Peel formally objected to Running Rein. What shall be the result? Thousands of lottery schemes are jeopardised, and racing sweeps; to say nothing about the settling forfeast week. Colonel Peel is aforetime of honour, and will not, cannot, treat the question but upon grounds with which he is satisfied, not only in the letter but the spirit. A vast amount of public inconvenience must come of the case remaining undecided many more days. We earnestly hope, for the sake of the turf, and its respect in men's eyes, that the decision of the stewards may be held conclusive. Take it to a court of law—justice we had nearly said—and what odds are there in favour of the wrong? If dealt with on its merits, it is almost certain to go the wrong way. Once upon a time a country squire was sued at the assizes for a debt of whose existence he had never heard till served with process for his money. The case was brought to the action produced witnesses who swore that the money was due. When the counsel for the defence rose, the rural and simple-hearted defendant was struck dumb with astonishment to hear him speak thus—"Gentlemen of the Jury, we by no means deny that the debt was contracted; but here are two respectable witnesses to swear they saw my client pay it." And so they die, and the plaintiff's case was non-suited; his adviser not being prepared for such a stake of policy. Had "the other side" gone on its merits it would have gone to the wall. There is plenty of evidence to be had for a consideration in the neighbourhood of Westminster hall to depose to Running Rein being own brother to the Trojan horse: it will be to the honour of the protestor to carry his objection no further than its truth admits of no reasonable question among men of plain and honest faith.

Hampton the favourite. The first heat won by a length, the second by a head.

In our paper of last week we announced that a protest had been entered against Running Rein, on the ground that he is not the horse described in the nomination. The objectors were Lord George. Lord G. Bentinck, Mr. Theobald, Mr. Ford, Mr. Cookes, Mr. Crockford, and John Scott. On Monday Lord Maidstone entered a protest against him and Leander, and it was fully expected that both cases would be gone into on their merits yesterday morning. Such, however, was not the fact; only the parties connected with the two horses were called upon, and sufficient evidence adduced by them to warrant the stewards to permit them to start for the Derby.

AQUATICS.

In addition to the events fixed to come off, as stated in last week's number, there have been since fixed the Eton Regatta, for June 3rd; the Cork Harbour Regatta, 30th and 31st; and the Lochaean Regatta, 27th and 28th.

A match will shortly come off, between the members of the Royal Academy and St. George's Boat Clubs The usual London course, it is thought, will be selected, and it is expected that the 7th or 8th of June will be fixed for the contest, which will, no doubt, be an extremely interesting one

From the fact of another match being announced to take place at Ostend between Newell, the London waterman, and the five Flemish men whom he lately defeated, it would appear that the latter ascribe their mortifying defeat to the hotness in the construction of the boat in which Newell rowed Nothing daunted, however, they have since procured a vessel from London, superior in every way to the one in which they previously appeared; and have, as stated made another match, which will be decided on Monday next. It is evident, whatever may be the result of the match, that in rowing much depends on the formation of the boats.

ROYAL THAMES AND HENLEY-ON-THAMES REGATTAS.—In our last number it was stated, that no arrangement as to change of time had been made between the committees of these clubs; both regattas being fixed to commence on the 26th of June. The matter, however, is now set at rest, as at the meeting of the former club, held on Monday last, it was announced that the Henley Regatta was postponed to the 25th and 26th of the same month.

YOUAL YACHT SQUADRON.—Several yachts connected with this club have lately arrived at Cowes, preparatory to its regatta.

GREAT RUNNING MATCH OF ONE HUNDRED YARDS.—The great one hundred yards race, for £50 a side, between John Smith, the Regent-street Pet, and Robinson, of Newton Moor, two men of considerable celebrity as runners, took place on Monday, at Kalung, in the presence of a vast assemblage of spectators, gentlemen, of all grades. The match had created very considerable interest, and good sums had been laid out at 5 to 4 on Robinson, odds which, at the time of starting, increased to 2 to 1, with takers amazingly shy. At about one the ground was cleared, the preliminaries having been arranged, the signal was given, and the men went away. Smith had a trifling advance for a few yards, when Robinson collared him, and they were nearest for a second. Robinson then dashed away from him, and won the race by three yards.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

On Saturday last her Majesty honoured this house with her presence. The performances were "Zampa," "La Gitana," scenes from "Don Pasquale," and the ballet of "Alma." On Tuesday "Don Pasquale" was repeated with nothing remarkable attending upon its representation. On Thursday, for Lablache's benefit, Cimarosa's graceful and witty opera, "Il Matrimonio Segreto," was performed, and most splendidly, too. Perhaps there is no character in his repertoire that developes Lablache's humour more than the old dealDon. The duet "Le Fisto," alone is worth a million of other things that would rival if they could. In the ballet Corito was more cheerished than ever, and bids fair to remove the great Fanny from her throne. Cerito is certainly improved to a wonderful degree; she once was agile wood -she now is graceful exoutchouc, or, more truly, one of the Graces themselves.

MUSIC.

ANCIENT CONCERTS.

The seventh performance took place on Wednesday evening, under the direction of the Duke of Cambridge. Conductor, Sir H. R. Bishop: Leaders, Mr. F. Cramer and Mr. Loder: Organ, Mr. Lucas. The following was the programme:—

PART I.

Coronation Anthem, "The King shall rejoice"	Handel.
Air, Miss E. Birch, "What, though I trace"	Handel.
Quintette, Salvi, Hawkins, Machin, and Standigl "Ah, lasciar" (Joseph)	Mehul.
Recit. and Air, Madame Caradori, "Dah parate"	Cimarosa.
Selection from a Service in C, "Gloria"	Cherubini.
Air, Madame Castellan, "With verdure clad"	Haydn.
Aria, Herr Standigl, "Possenti Numi"	Mozart.
Grand Chorus, "Immortal Lord" (Deborah)	Handel.

PART II.

Overture (Ariadne)	Handel
Recitative and Air, Madame Caradori, "Oh invito"	Zingarelli.
Glee, Miss Birch, Messrs. Hawkins, Dobbs, Perkins, and Machin, "O bird of eve"	Lord Mornington.
Aria, Signor Salvi, "Rendi il sereno"	Handel.
Chorus, "The many rend its chaine"	Handel.
Aria, Madame Castellan, "Dove sono"	Mozart.
Air, Herr Standigl, "Al tardor della vendetta"	Handel.
Chorus, "O sing praises"	J. S. Bach.

In ignorance the mighty genius of Handel prevailed, as it ought, over all the musicians of the earth. All other things seemed weak and puerile, contrasted with his gigantic, muscular power; and yet, ever and anon, he was gentle as when "Nigtingales mourn their tuneful lays." The anthem was first performed by Miss Birch, Messrs. Hawkins, Hobbs, and Machin, with chorus—the splendid fugue was given in a masterly style. Mdme. Castellan sang Haydn's "With verdure clad" (may we dare to say so?) better than Doras Gras did the other night, at Braham's benefit concert. Herr Staudigl was, as usual, equally great in everything he undertook - Handel, Haydn, Mozart, &c.—in short, let it be good music, and the better it is, the better is he. Salvi sang Handel's "Lord remember David," the Handel words, to which it was originally composed. Can need and we say, beautifully? Bach's fugue is elaborate, but none of his productions equal Handel's, in clearness of design and neatness of execution. The whole concert was a treat of the highest order.

EXETER HALL.

The only great choral meeting for this season, of the upper singing schools, instructed on the method of Wilhelm, took place at Exeter-hall, on Thursday evening last, under the direction of Mr. John Hullah.

This was something truly worth seeing as well as hearing. to witness an auditory, or rather the occupants of that part of a public place, assembled so called, and not to hear music merely as amusement, intending to sing from it;—and then again that auditory, or cantatory, without an instrument to guide them, singing well, and well in tune, was one of those wonders which we reverence in the records of antiquity, but were very sceptical about in our own days, until we heard the performance on Thursday evening.

The hall was crowded to excess, but chiefly by those who took part in the performance, which sufficiently accounts for the few encores; for as Dr. Pangloss says, "In their own merits modest men are dumb. The venerable Bishop of Gloucester, however, kindly interfered between their modesty and their wish, and caused several things to be repeated. The entrance of Benedict into the select part of the hall, was hailed with unequivocal symptoms of delight on the part of the general audience. We were glad to perceive that the ear for madrigal is not deaf—some of the compositions in that style were most enthusiastically encored. The massive effect of the congregated voices in simple airs was grand in the extreme. There was no organ it was non et preterea nihil, but in the very best acceptation of the phrase. It was one of those things—

That may be heard,
But ne'er can more be seen our ears
E'en once in every thousand years.

COVENT GARDEN THEATRE.—BRAHAM'S CONCERT.

On Monday night last this theatre was opened for the reception of a most splendid and numerous audience, to receive delightful and varied treat provided for them. The veteran Braham never sang better in our recollection; his voice is "primavo in flore juventæ," and his style of singing was certainly more chaste and finished than it has been of late years. His performance, or rather musical declamation, of "In splendour bright" was truly magnificent, and his "Deeper and deeper still" continues to be his exclusive property in the domain of vocal eloquence. The selection from the "Creation" was very finely given by Madame Doras Gras, Mrs. Newton, Herr Staudigl, and the beneficiaire. "With verdure clad," was deliciously sung by Madame Doras Gras; Mrs. Newton gave "The marvellous works" most feelingly, and was encored; and Staudigl was perfectly electrifying in "Rolling in foaming billows." Between the first and second parts the unrivalled Lindley played a solo on the violoncello, with unabated vigour and tone. His double stopping and harmonies must have surprised Offenbach, had he been in the house. The second and third parts were miscellaneous, and afforded ample opportunity to everybody to display the amount and versatility of their genius. Miss Alleyne was encored in Bishop's song, "Peace inviting," and the Misses Williams sang the duet of the "Merry gypsies" very admirably. Mr. Hamilton Braham possesses a splendid voice and is rapidly improving as a vocalist. We are happy to give a similar opinion of his brother Charles. We must not forget Blagrove's air, with variations, on the violin, which was most deservedly and rapturously applauded. The orchestra was deficient in wind instruments—it was quite amusing to hear two or three violins, in the absence of trombones, attempt to give effect to the crash-chords that occur between the first and second parts of Mozart's overture of Zauberflöte. But we must not criticise a concert of this kind as if it were one of a series. There was certainly enough (we were going to say too much) to admire.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

The third concert of this national institution was given on last Saturday, at the Hanover-square Rooms, and was fully and fashionably attended; the following was the programme:—

PART I.

Overture (MS.)—"Undine"	Miss Bendixen.
Chorus—"Come gentle Spring" (Seasons)	Haydn.
Aria—"Lacia chia piange," Miss E. Mason (Armida)	Handel.
Serenade ed Allegro Giojoso Pianoforte, Miss Barker (King's Scholar)	Mendelsohn.
Solo and Chorus—"Dryads, Sylvans," Miss Marshall (Tancredi)	Handel.
Aria—"Deh per questo," Miss Lear (La Clemenza di Tito)	Mozart.
Duetto—"Qual Anelante," Misses Marshall and S. Flower	Marcello.
Finale to the First Act of Medea—The principal parts by Misses Barnett, Dawson, Ramsgate, Captain Rodgers, Blexsome, and Latter	Mayer.

BETWEEN THE PARTS

Fantasia on Themes from Mose, Harp, Mr. J. Thomas	Parish Alvars.
Andante and Rondo from Concerto in D, Pianoforte, Mr. Wilkinson	Mendelssohn.
Aria—"Per pieta," Miss Hague (Cosi fan tutti)	Mozart.
Madrigal—"Flow, oh my tears" (1599)	Bennett.
Fantasia on Themes from Zampa—Violoncello, Mr. Horatio Clegg	Hausmann.
Terzetto—"In quel soggiorno," Misses Graham and D'Ernst, and Mr. Latter (Teobaldo ed Isolina)	Morlacchi.
Finale to the Second Act of Il Don Giovanni	Mozart.

Leader, Mr. Loder. —Conductor, Mr. C. Lucas.

The overture by Miss Bendixen is an extraordinary production for a young lady; it abounds with passages which would not disgrace even Mendelssohn himself (who was present, and applauded it much). Marcello's duetto was very cleverly sung by Misses Marshall and S. Flower, and was deservedly encored. Miss Lear sang Mozart's "Deh per questo" in a most artistical style, and Mr. H. Clupp's performance of Hausmann's fantasia for violoncello gave promise that at no very distant time he will rank with the first professors of his instrument. It was altogether an excellent concert, and gave proof of how much native talent there is if it can but meet with encouragement. The institution's most zealous patron, the Earl of Westmoreland, is expected to be shortly in town.

SOCIETA ARMONICA.

The fourth concert of this society took place on Monday evening last at the Hanover-square Rooms, when, we think, there was a fuller assemblage of dilettanti than on any previous occasion. The following was the programme:—

PART I.

Symphony, in C Minor	Beethoven.
Aria, Signor Salvi, "A te dirò" (Roberto Devereux)	Donnetti.
Fantasia, Oboe, Mr. Grattan Cooke	Cooke.
Aria, Mrs. Alexander Newton, "O dolce concento,"	Mozart.
Flute Obligato (Drouet), Mr. Card
Fantasia, Violin, Signor Cesare Rossi, on airs from "Ricciarda Horgia"	Rossi.
Ballade, Mrs. Newton, "Quand je quittai la Normandie" (Robert le Diable)	Meyerbeer.
MS. Overture	Parish Alvars.

PART II.

Overture to Euryanthe	Weber.
Romanza, Signor Salvi, "Ciel pietoso, Ciel clemente" (Oberto di St. Bonifacio)	Verdi.
Grand Concertante Duett, for two Harps, with Orchestral accompaniments, Mr. Parish Alvars and Mr. J. Balsir Chatterton	Parish Alvars.
Air, Madame Dorus Gras, "Le Serment"	Auber.
Grand Capriccio, for the Violin, Signor Cesare Rossi	Rossi.
Song, Mrs. Alexander Newton, "O come to the greenwood"	Mendelssohn.
Overture, "La Clemenza di Tito"	Mozart.

Conductor, Mr. Forbes.—Leader, Mr. Loder.

The great attractions of the evening were Mdme. Dorus Gras, and Signor Salvi, who were perseveringly encored in everything they sang—"a custom more honoured in the breach than the observance"—we hate encores. Mrs. Newton has a beautiful and flexible voice, but, perhaps, an porechino pin illata, it would be better if Rossini's genteel pupil and protegé, Signor Cesare Rossi, played twice with considerable effect, but we do not "much affect" his music. Grattan Cook's Fantasia on the Oboe was exquisite, but the chef novelties of the evening in the instrumental department were the composition and performance of Mr. Parish Alvars, each of which was loudly applauded.

His manuscript overture, with which the first part terminated, is not, perhaps, the most original production in the world, but it is admirably instrumented and proved highly effective. The duet for two harps, by the composer and Mr. J. Balsir Chatterton, was exquisitely performed. The fifth concert will take place on the 3rd of June. Ernst is engaged, with the following vocalists: Madame Castellan, Miss M. B. Hawes, Signor Fergetti, &c.

Mr. Webster, the spirited and liberal lessee of the Haymarket Theatre, has made the following announcement:—

"Theatre Royal Haymarket.—The Prize Comedy. Mr. Webster begs to announce that the committee to award the prize of £200, with contingent advantages, for the best prize comedy, illustrative of British manners and customs, at their twentieth meeting, this day, are vested at the following decision:—Resolved, unanimously, that the prize be awarded to the comedy of "Quid Pro Quo, or, The Day of Dupes." Signed, Charles M. Young, Esq.; E. B. Mcrray, Esq.; Henry Otley, Esq.; J. Clarke Searle, Esq.; The Rev Alex. Dyce, G. P. R. James, Esq.; Charles Kemble, Esq., chairman. May 18, 1844."

The committee, we congratulate the public on their merits modest men are dumb. The venerable Bishop of Gloucester, however, kindly interfered between their modesty and their wish, and caused several things to be repeated. The entrance of Benedict into the select part of the hall, was hailed with unequivocal symptoms of delight on the part of the general audience. The committee, we congratulate the public on their merits modest men are dumb. The venerable Bishop of Gloucester, however, kindly interfered between their modesty and their wish, and caused several things to be repeated. The entrance of Benedict into the select part of the hall, was hailed with unequivocal symptoms of delight on the part of the general audience. We were glad to perceive that the ear for madrigal is not deaf—some of the compositions in that style were most enthusiastically encored. The massive effect of the congregated voices in simple airs was grand in the extreme. There was no organ it was non et preterea nihil, but in the very best acceptation of the phrase. COVENT GARDEN THEATRE.—BRAHAM'S CONCERT.

On Monday night last this theatre was opened for the reception of a most splendid and numerous audience, to receive delightful and varied treat provided for them. The veteran Braham never sang better in our recollection; his voice is "primavo in flore juventæ," and his style of singing was certainly more chaste and finished than it has been of late years. His performance, or rather musical declamation, of "In splendour bright" was truly magnificent, and his "Deeper and deeper still" continues to be his exclusive property in the domain of vocal eloquence. The selection from the "Creation" was very finely given by Madame Doras Gras, Mrs. Newton, Herr Staudigl, and the beneficiaire. "With verdure clad," was deliciously sung by Madame Doras Gras; Mrs. Newton gave "The marvellous works" most feelingly, and was encored; and Staudigl was perfectly electrifying in "Rolling in foaming billows." Between the first and second parts the unrivalled Lindley played a solo on the violoncello, with unabated vigour and tone. His double stopping and harmonies must have surprised Offenbach, had he been in the house. The second and third parts were miscellaneous, and afforded ample opportunity to everybody to display the amount and versatility of their genius. Miss Alleyne was encored in Bishop's song, "Peace inviting," and the Misses Williams sang the duet of the "Merry gypsies" very admirably. Mr. Hamilton Braham possesses a splendid voice and is rapidly improving as a vocalist. We are happy to give a similar opinion of his brother Charles. We must not forget Blagrove's air, with variations, on the violin, which was most deservedly and rapturously applauded. The orchestra was deficient in wind instruments—it was quite amusing to hear two or three violins, in the absence of trombones, attempt to give effect to the crash-chords that occur between the first and second parts of Mozart's overture of Zauberflöte. But we must not criticise a concert of this kind as if it were one of a series. There was certainly enough (we were going to say too much) to admire.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

The third concert of this national institution was given on last Saturday, at the Hanover-square Rooms, and was fully and fashionably attended; the following was the programme:—

PART I.

Overture (MS.)—"Undine"	Miss Bendixen.
Chorus—"Come gentle Spring" (Seasons)	Haydn.
Aria—"Lacia chia piange," Miss E. Mason (Armida)	Handel.
Serenade ed Allegro Giojoso Pianoforte, Miss Barker (King's Scholar)	Mendelsohn.
Solo and Chorus—"Dryads, Sylvans," Miss Marshall (Tancredi)	Handel.
Aria—"Deh per questo," Miss Lear (La Clemenza di Tito)	Mozart.
Duetto—"Qual Anelante," Misses Marshall and S. Flower	Marcello.
Finale to the First Act of Medea—The principal parts by Misses Barnett, Dawson, Ramsgate, Captain Rodgers, Blexsome, and Latter	Mayer.

BETWEEN THE PARTS

Fantasia on Themes from Mose, Harp, Mr. J. Thomas	Parish Alvars.
Andante and Rondo from Concerto in D, Pianoforte, Mr. Wilkinson	Mendelssohn.
Aria—"Per pieta," Miss Hague (Cosi fan tutti)	Mozart.
Madrigal—"Flow, oh my tears" (1599)	Bennett.
Fantasia on Themes from Zampa—Violoncello, Mr. Horatio Clegg	Hausmann.
Terzetto—"In quel soggiorno," Misses Graham and D'Ernst, and Mr. Latter (Teobaldo ed Isolina)	Morlacchi.
Finale to the Second Act of Il Don Giovanni	Mozart.

Leader, Mr. Loder. —Conductor, Mr. C. Lucas.

The overture by Miss Bendixen is an extraordinary production for a young lady; it abounds with passages which would not disgrace even Mendelssohn himself (who was present, and applauded it much). Marcello's duetto was very cleverly sung by Misses Marshall and S. Flower, and was deservedly encored. Miss Lear sang Mozart's "Deh per questo" in a most artistical style, and Mr. H. Clupp's performance of Hausmann's fantasia for violoncello gave promise that at no very distant time he will rank with the first professors of his instrument. It was altogether an excellent concert, and gave proof of how much native talent there is if it can but meet with encouragement. The institution's most zealous patron, the Earl of Westmoreland, is expected to be shortly in town.

SOCIETA ARMONICA.

The fourth concert of this society took place on Monday evening last at the Hanover-square Rooms, when, we think, there was a fuller assemblage of dilettanti than on any previous occasion. The following was the programme:—

PART I.

Symphony, in C Minor	Beethoven.
Aria, Signor Salvi, "A te dirò" (Roberto Devereux)	Donnetti.
Fantasia, Oboe, Mr. Grattan Cooke	Cooke.
Aria, Mrs. Alexander Newton, "O dolce concento,"	Mozart.
Flute Obligato (Drouet), Mr. Card
Fantasia, Violin, Signor Cesare Rossi, on airs from "Ricciarda Horgia"	Rossi.
Ballade, Mrs. Newton, "Quand je quittai la Normandie" (Robert le Diable)	Meyerbeer.
MS. Overture	Parish Alvars.

PART II.

Overture to Euryanthe	Weber.
Romanza, Signor Salvi, "Ciel pietoso, Ciel clemente" (Oberto di St. Bonifacio)	Verdi.
Grand Concertante Duett, for two Harps, with Orchestral accompaniments, Mr. Parish Alvars and Mr. J. Balsir Chatterton	Parish Alvars.
Air, Madame Dorus Gras, "Le Serment"	Auber.
Grand Capriccio, for the Violin, Signor Cesare Rossi	Rossi.
Song, Mrs. Alexander Newton, "O come to the greenwood"	Mendelssohn.
Overture, "La Clemenza di Tito"	Mozart.

Conductor, Mr. Forbes.—Leader, Mr. Loder.

The great attractions of the evening were Mdme. Dorus Gras, and Signor Salvi, who were perseveringly encored in everything they sang—"a custom more honoured in the breach than the observance"—we hate encores. Mrs. Newton has a beautiful and flexible voice, but, perhaps, an porechino pin illata, it would be better if Rossini's genteel pupil and protegé, Signor Cesare Rossi, played twice with considerable effect, but we do not "much affect" his music. Grattan Cook's Fantasia on the Oboe was exquisite, but the chef novelties of the evening in the instrumental department were the composition and performance of Mr. Parish Alvars, each of which was loudly applauded.

His manuscript overture, with which the first part terminated, is not, perhaps, the most original production in the world, but it is admirably instrumented and proved highly effective. The duet for two harps, by the composer and Mr. J. Balsir Chatterton, was exquisitely performed. The fifth concert will take place on the 3rd of June. Ernst is engaged, with the following vocalists: Madame Castellan, Miss M. B. Hawes, Signor Fergetti, &c.

Mr. Webster, the spirited and liberal lessee of the Haymarket Theatre, has made the following announcement:—

"Theatre Royal Haymarket.—The Prize Comedy. Mr. Webster begs to announce that the committee to award the prize of £200, with contingent advantages, for the best prize comedy, illustrative of British manners and customs, at their twentieth meeting, this day, are vested at the following decision:—Resolved, unanimously, that the prize be awarded to the comedy of "Quid Pro Quo, or, The Day of Dupes." DESTRUCTION OF NAWORTH CASTLE, BY FIRE.

BURNING OF NAWORTH CASTLE—FROM A DRAWING MADE ON THE SPOT.

We regret to record the destruction by fire of this most perfect and interesting of the Border Castles that have existed to our time. Sir Walter Scott has well described it as "one of those extensive baronial seats which marked the splendour of our ancient nobles, before they exchanged the hospitable magnificence of a life spent among a numerous tenantry for the uncertain honours of Court attendance, and the equivocal rewards of Ministerial favour."

This extensive and interesting structure, situated in the parish of Brampton, at a distance of eleven miles north-east of Carlisle and three from Brampton, was the baronial residence of the Lords of Gilsland, and a seat of the Earl of Carlisle. The distressing intelligence of the fire reached Carlisle at five o'clock on Saturday evening last, and it was soon confirmed by the ominous smoke that rose from the hills beyond Brampton, amidst which the castle was beautifully situated, on elevated ground, overlooking the Vale of Irthing. A special train was immediately despatched from the station of the Newcastle line, conveying the powerful fire-engines of this borough, with a suitable force of policemen, and in less than an hour after the alarm had reached Carlisle, the engines had arrived at the scene of destruction.

We regret to say, however, that, notwithstanding this despatch, the fire had made such a rapid progress, that it was soon quite evident there was no chance whatever of saving the venerable castle. There was a very scanty supply of water, for although there was a tank of considerable size over the keep, and some springs were within the walls, they were wholly insufficient to produce any perceptible effect upon the conflagration; and, in spite of every effort that could be made, the fire speedily involved the whole building, the dryness of the old wainscoat rendering it as inflammable as touchwood.

The fire, it appears, was first discovered about half-past three o'clock, and not at noon, as before stated, by a son of Mr. Orridge, the Governor of Carlisle Gaol, who happened accidentally to be present, and it was owing to his presence of mind that assistance was procured in time to save any of the property. There were none but women in the castle when the fire was discovered, and the young gentleman ran not less than two miles to Kirkhaus, where there are some collieries belonging to the Earl of Carlisle, to procure assistance, and also despatched messengers to Carlisle and Brampton.

The fire is supposed to have originated in the porter's-lodge, in consequence of the flues being out of order or too much intersected with wood: and although there was at first a report that it was the act of an incendiary, this is certainly not the impression now. The flames soon spread through the entire quadrangle, burning with such intense fury as almost to defy the great exertions made under the directions of John Ramshay, Esq., to save the relics of antiquity, books, panel pictures, and ancient furniture with which the building was stored. At about six o'clock, it may be said to have reached its height.

> There, one by one was heard to fall
> The tower, the donjon-keep, the hall;
> Each rushing down with thunder sound
> A space the conflagration drowned,
> Till gathering strength again it rose,
> Announced its triumph in its close;
> Shook wide its light the landscape o'er,
> Then sunk—and Naworth was no more!

By eight o'clock, the castle was burnt down, with the exception of the steward's residence on the western and a portion of Belted Willie's Tower on the eastern side of the quadrangle. The amount of property saved is more than might have been expected, but the damage done is altogether irreparable. Much of the magnificent tapestry has been consumed, and the stately halls are utterly destroyed. The regret and consternation which this disastrous fire has spread through the country cannot be described. Naworth had long been an object of local pride and of great interest to all visitors to the district. It was, in fact, one of the most important of the "sights" in Cumberland.

Naworth Castle was built by Ralph Lord Dacre, soon after 1335, partly of white, and part of red freestone; and though, with its mantling ivy, it wore the aspect of great antiquity, it was, by no means, ruinous. The property passed into the family of the Howards by marriage. Lord William Howard, third son of Thomas Duke of Norfolk—the famous "Belted Will" of Border history, and ancestor to the Earls of Carlisle succeeded to it and a large domain annexed, in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, in right of his wife Elizabeth, sister of George Lord Dacre, who died without heirs male. He was Warden of the Western Marches, and was distinguished for his learning and literary research, as well as for the rigour with which he repelled the excesses of the daring moss-troopers who ventured to foray in his district. In the Castle of Naworth, his private apartments, comprising a bedroom, oratory, and library, as well as the "Bilboa blade, by marchmen felt," the broad and studded belt in which he wore it, his embroidered gloves, and splendid suit of armour, were shown to the public, in addition to the other objects of interest in the castle. Sir Walter Scott, in allusion to these memorials, says:—"As the ancient books and furniture have remained undisturbed, the venerable appearance of these apartments, and the armour scattered around the chamber, almost lead us to expect the arrival of the Warden in person." All these relics have either been consumed in the fire, or hopelessly damaged in removal.

The castle was a fine fortress, placed upon the edge of a ravine, overlooking a large expanse of ground; its amazingly thick walls being measured not by feet, but yards, and its secret winding passages, dungeons, portcullised gateways, and narrow stone staircases, all speaking of a period and a place that required watchfulness and defence before comfort and embellishment. In plan it was quadrangular, and placed at a point where two foaming brooks, before their confluence, swept down the hill at the opposite sides of a precipitous rock. It was only to be reached from the south, where it had formerly been protected by a double moat, whilst a barbican defended the drawbridge. Here the principal front extended to a length of 208 feet. This front was guarded at each end by a lofty battlemented tower, from a corner of which sprang a slender watch-turret. The grand gateway led into the outer court, and above it were boldly sculptured in stone the armorial bearings of families who possessed the castle before it came into the hands of the Howards. To gain admission to the great courtyard the visitor had to pass through a low narrow archway, that pierced the main building not quite in a line with the grand gateway we have mentioned. Out of this courtyard, which, from the picturesque appearance given to it by oriel windows, sculptured doorways, fantastic chimneys, and thick bushes of climbing ivy, demanded something more than a passing glance, many entrances led into the interior of the mansion.

Among the apartments should first be mentioned the Great Hall, seventy feet by twenty-four, chiefly lighted by a large bay window; the ceiling being paneled with 120 portraits of the Saxon and early English monarchs. The dining-room was tapestried, and hung with many historical portraits. Upon the ceiling of the chapel was painted the genealogical tree of the Howards, and of the previous owners of Naworth. The guard-room, 116 feet long, formed a sort of gallery in the south front for armour and paintings: among the latter was a fine portrait of Charles I., by Vandyke; Sir Walter Raleigh; Lord William Russell, winding up his watch for the last time before his execution; Queen Bess in an enormous ruff, Arthur Lord Capel, beheaded in 1648. Here too were shown the relics of "Belted Will:" his cradle, military saddle, gloves, and "broad and studded belt," alluded to in the "Lay of the Last Minstrel," and whence (according to Scott) the Lord Warden of the Marches derived his well-known epithet.

LANERCOST PRIORY, NEAR NAWORTH.

Passing from the guard chamber into one of the towers on the south front, a dark cavernous passage led to Lord William's bedchamber. The room was furnished with appliances of defence, and means of escape to boot. The first consisted in a floor formed of a composition as hard as stone, and doors of enormous thickness, secured with bars and bolts past counting. The second in a secret apartment, vaulted, and without light, entrance to which was gained by removing a portion of the wainscot paneling. A winding staircase conducted from the sleeping apartment to a room above, stored with books and manuscripts.

Alongside the place of study was the place of prayer. The oratory contained a quantity of carved wood brought from the neighbouring priory of Lanercost, and a confessional. The books, furniture, &c. in these apartments were thrown from the window; the apartments have escaped, but the lower part of the tower is much burnt. Before descending from this "peaceful citadel," we might have conducted the reader to the watch-turret, thence to gaze upon the whole vale of Lanercost, scattered with villages and farms, woods and pastures, that stretch away to the border highlands.

The dungeons (to make a rapid transition from airy turrets to earless dens) are formidable affairs indeed. Not a ray of light was allowed to penetrate, and rings in the wall remained to show that my lord-warden knew how to keep a prisoner when he had caught him.

The castle is stated to have been insured to the amount of £10,000, but the loss to the lover of architectural antiquities must be irreparable.

Naworth Castle was not often the residence of the noble family to whom it belonged, as they preferred the greater splendour and convenience of Castle Howard, in Yorkshire, where they are at present residing; but, in the shooting season, the younger members of the family and their friends assembled at Naworth to enjoy the field sports, for which the wild character of the surrounding country affords peculiar facilities.

We have mentioned the Priory of Lanercost. The ruins of the monastic buildings are very extensive, and are situated in a secluded vale, watered by the Irthing, surrounded by well-wooded heights, and very near to Naworth. The arch of the gate-house remains; the church is cruciform: it consists of a nave, with only one aisle (the north), and a transept; and a choir, with a low embattled square tower at the intersection of the cross: the western doorway is very fine. Among the other remains, are the Prior's Lodgings and the Hospitium, the Cloisters and Refectory, or great dining-hall. The church, except the western front, is in the transition style from the Norman to the early English. The Priory was founded in the middle of the twelfth century, and the monks of Lanercost are of some celebrity. At the suppression of monasteries, the site of the Priory was granted to Sir Thomas Dacre, an illegitimate son of Thomas Lord Dacre, of Naworth Castle: upon the death of the last of this family, without male issue, the Priory estate reverted to the Crown, and is now held on lease by the Earl of Carlisle.

Such of our readers as may be induced to visit Naworth and Lanercost, or who wish to learn more of their histories, should provide themselves with a neatly compiled "Account" of these interesting places, published by Jefferson, of Carlisle.

INTERIOR OF NAWORTH CASTLE, DURING THE CONFLAGRATION.

ASCENSION DAY AT NEWCASTLE-UPON-TYNE.

Holy-Thursday, popularly named "Barge-Day" at Newcastle, is a similar aquatic display of Lord Mayor's Day in London; but from the comparative smallness of the town, and the greater portion of the inhabitants having some connection with naval affairs, the interest is more universal. In every warehouse, workshop, and factory, the calculations are made of the tardy arrival of the important day. The pence are carefully collected, and plans arranged for a grand show. In the dock-yards, boat-builders, foundries, glass-works, potteries, chemical works, soaperies, white-lead factories, coal barge villages, roperies, sail-cloth lofts, and the little shipping stations, all is preparation. New gigs are built, old boats repaired, dashing flags, gaudy painting, new oars are all actively in process, to do honour to the Right Worshipful the Mayor, on this day, as conservator of the river, when proclaiming the bounds of his jurisdiction on "the coaly Tyne." Such was the scene on Thursday week, when the sonorous major bell of St. Nicholas boomed forth the hour of six, and the streets were filled with thousands of men and boys hurrying to the river side. The sound of the bells was soon lost in the roar of the castle guns, for the Mayor was about to embark. The bridge presented one mass of anxious faces; every spot of the quay, the barges, the outer tier of shipping, the rigging, being clustered with spectators.

First, stately flowed on in measured time the Mayor's barge, his worship recognising and acknowledging the hearty cheers of the different groups, surrounded by his friends. Betwixt were the easy regular strokes of the Trinity barge, with the embrowned cargo of vigorous-looking men; in close proximity was the River Jury-barge, with its citizen passengers; then, the gaily-decked snug-awned steamer, with the Corporation Companies' stewards; and other steamers with fares for a day's enjoyment. Then came the hobs—the foundry men with their light iron boat, their gay flags and ribbon-dressed men; the glassmen with their emblematic glass feathers. A laugh and a half-suffocating cheer rolled on. A ken, with a set of comical dogs, dressed as "learned brothers," in wig and gown, trod to the bar (of the river), while a grave judge acted as coxswain, gracefully bowing to give the tone to the gentlemen on the benches. Next came soapery men, with their Liberal colours; whitelead men, with their Conservative; and ropery men, with the Whig. In a cluster, but among the distinguished of the distinguishable, were the Friar's Goose, the Bill Point, the Stells, and the Blaydon, crack gigs. Every few yards of the banks of the river, every turn, every factory work, and coal spout with small batches of shipping, were hung with flaunting flags and mimic batteries, and loud cheers greeted the water exhibition. At last, Shields, with her thousands of black "smaahees," all "swaggering" with the sea in the vista, became visible; hundreds more of boats and cobles joined the gala; the proud Shields' gig was recognised by its vivid painting.

The balconies and windows of the houses were filled with "gaye ladyes;" the quay, the ropery banks, the library, and the Low Lights, responded to welcomes. The sea now bore the gay party. The water bailiff read the proclamation, whilst the six and eight-oared gigs display themselves amid the billows on the bar. In the procession were two unwieldy vessels, like Brobdignag halves of walnut-shells; these are coal-barges, or keels, with twenty stalwart rowers, enjoying the fun. The ceremony at Spar Hawk being over, and the Low Lights regained, beef, beer, brandy, and bread were vigorously attacked, after a row of twelve miles. The gunpowder signals for a return were sounded amidst the shrill fifes of the gigs, the bugles of the cutters, the glass trumpets of glass artizans, and the bands of the steamers: The Keel-row, the Bonny Pit Laddie, Canny Newcastle, God save the Queen, Rule Britannia, Scots wha hae, Fairly shot of her, &c. The bridge at Newcastle was again reached.

Another rest and another feast now ensued. Preparations were made for the grandest display, and the more sober and wealthy citizens' dames occupied every place of view; friends residing at the water-side had monster tea-parties. Apprentices were liberated for the half-holiday, who seized upon filthy rotten craft, at a few pence, with apologies for oars, to participate in the sport. The flushed servant-maid—the delicate fish-ladies—the smart clay-girls—the showy factory females—and the élite of Sandgate, in rainbow apparel—all crowded the steamers, or trudged by the side of the river, to the grand rendezvous. The bells rang, the cannon roared, and the procession moved on to the other point of jurisdiction—Hedwin Streams: here were scrambling, racing, and sports of all kinds, after the grave and important duties of the water bailiff had been accomplished. Once more in motion, a large sit, called King's Meadow, was made the grand scene of revelry,—and then commenced the admirable boat-races. At nine, the Mayor and other "grave seignors" returned to finish the day by a "pint stoup" in the town. The popularity of the present Mayor, Sir John Fife, caused an immense concourse to pay their respects to him by their attendance.

The accompanying view of this recreative ceremony is taken from Cookson's Wharf: the flat-headed hill conspicuous in the distance is one of the "ballast hills"—the celebrated mounts on the Tyne formed in the course of ages, from the discharged ballast of trading vessels.

"BARGE DAY ON THE TYNE," AT NEWCASTLE.

MR. CHARLES KEMBLE'S READING AND RECITATION FROM SHAKSPEARE.

Previous to Mr. Kemble's appearance at Willis's Rooms (noticed in our journal of last week), he had the honour of reading the play of "Cymbeline" before her Majesty, Prince Albert, and the Court, at Buckingham Palace. The lectio was given in the Picture Gallery, and the arrangements were as represented in our engraving.

Whether the recollection of the days when he personated the haughty son of Richard Cœur de Lion with such unrivalled gallant bearing, or whether the timidity for his undertaking has worn away, we know not; but Mr. Kemble certainly appeared, on Monday last, with decided superiority over his previous performance. There was less mere reading, there was more of dramatic oratory delivered with ore rotundo than on the former occasion, which gave a vividness and colouring to the recited picture that were quite delightful. In Faulconbridge he now and then remembered his "wonted fire," and delivered the bold speeches of that reckless "good blunt fellow," that "madcap," as King John terms him, with as much gusto and spirit as we can recollect him to have done with all the advantages of the stage. His reply to the citizen of Angiers was given with astonishing effect. His reading, or rather recitation, of the scene between Hubert and Arthur was touching in the extreme, and the death of King John was most powerfully affecting—particularly that mournful confession of the monarch

> I am a scribbled form, drawn with a pen,
> Upon a parchment," &c.,

to the end, when he dies.

The Queen Dowager, with suite, was present, and seemed highly delighted with Mr. Kemble,s truly elegant reading. The applause was more considerable than on the former occasion. Tuesday night the subject chosen was the First Part of "Henry IV." — it was a pity, we thought, to compress Poor Jack.

The next readings will be "Othello," on Monday, May 27. "Romeo and Juliet," on Thursday, May 30. "Hamlet," June 3. Commencing each night at nine o'clock.

COUNTRY NEWS.

ETON.—THE MONTEM.—The whole of the arrangements for the due and effective celebration of this grand triennial festival, which will take place on Tuesday next, were completed on Wednesday last, the arrangements having been made in the anticipation that the Montem will be honoured with the presence of the Sovereign and her illustrious Consort.

FOLKESTONE.—DESTRUCTIVE FIRE.—On Monday, shortly after three o'clock, much excitement was occasioned at Folkestone, by the arrival of a mounted express with intelligence that a fire of a most alarming character had just broken out in the extensive homestead occupied by Mr. Taylor, and known as Embrook Farm, situate about midway between Folkestone and Cheriton. The fire engine was immediately despatched with an efficient body of men to the scene of destruction, about two and a half miles distant. On arriving at the spot, the fire was found to be raging furiously in the stack yard belonging to the farm. Two wheat stacks were already destroyed, and the flames were rapidly extending themselves. Before water could be procured in any sufficient quantity to be of service, several stacks were on fire, and a strong north-easterly wind was blowing at the time. Within a little more than half an hour of the outbreak, a large barn full of wheat, all the ricks in the stack yard, and various lesser outbuildings, were one complete burning mass. So rapid was its progress that all those at work on the farm where the fire broke out could do, was to remove the horses and other live stock out of danger. It was rumoured that the accident originated from a spark supposed to have blown from the locomotive engine of the eleven o'clock express from the stackyard, and, from a personal inspection of the spot, such an occurrence appears extremely probable. Enbrook Farm is situated in a valley, on the south side of the railway, about two and a-half miles from Folkestone.

HALIFAX. STEAM-BOILER ACCIDENT.—Two months ago we had to relate the particulars of a dreadful steam-boiler explosion, which involved six persons in premature death, and their families in mourning. We have this week again to record a second accident of a somewhat similar description, though happily not attended with fatal results to so large a number. The mill at which the accident occurred is commonly known as Shroder's, and on last Friday the engine was put on at the usual hour, but about seven was so over-weighted that the speed was not sufficient to enable the weavers to weave. About ten o'clock the accident happened. A plate on the left hand side of the boiler, about three or four feet from the furnace doors, and which was seen to leak, suddenly burst through and discharged the hot water and steam on the fire, which was of course cast out with great violence, and scattered around on everything near. Steam also was propagated, and with that from the boiler, filled the place, and the boiling water covered the floor. There were six men and a youth in the boiler-house at the time, all of whom were more or less scalded. Two of these were John Robinson, aged 18, whose parents reside at Clayton, and William Rigg, aged 21, both weavers in the employ of Messrs. Acroyd. They were covered with the fire and water, and it is said that, in attempting to escape, they slipped and fell back into the water, but it appears doubtful whether that was so or not. Robinson died about four o'clock the same afternoon, Rigg about two next morning. On Tuesday an inquest was held at the Durham Ox, on view of the body of Robinson, before Mr. Jewison, coroner, and a highly respectable jury. The evidence was of a very voluminous character, and the jury were occupied upwards of twelve hours with the investigation. After a deliberation of half an hour they returned a verdict of "Accidentally killed by the bursting of a steam-boiler." They also laid a deodand of £100 on the boiler and engine, and expressed their opinion that Messrs. J. and J. Greenwood and Messrs. Thomas Ackroyd and Sons, were severely censurable for their conduct in putting on more power than the boiler in its unsafe condition was calculated to carry; also their regret that they could not reach them by a fine. They, therefore, requested that they should be called in to receive the censure through the coroner in the presence of the jurors.

LIVERPOOL.—EXTENSIVE FRAUD ON THE LIVERPOOL PAWNBROKERS.—On Tuesday last, a middle-aged man, dressed in a suit of shabby-genteel black, named John Parry, was brought before Mr. Rushton, at the Polic e-court, on a charge of having obtained under false pretences a considerable sum by the means, under the following circumstances:—Mr. Commissioner Dowling briefly stated the case, and said the prisoner had succeeded in obtaining the money principally by pledging rings and crosses at pawnbrokers' establishments as gold, which were not gold, and in some instances selling the art cles, when were most ingeniously wrought, and edged with gold, and the bulk of which was of platina, mixed with gold. It would be perfectly true as stated by the prisoner to himself to be gold; that he said that his son brought them from Malta, and that they were composed of Maltese gold; and, under these circumstances, the charge would assume a felonious complexion, and a description applied to it, of obtaining money under false pretences. A number of pawnbrokers' clerks having deposed to the facts on oath. Mr. Rushton said the articles were skilfully manufactured, and that they were evidently made of platina, with a very heavy metal, a d cased with gold.—Mr. Jones, silversmith, of Castle-street, examined the rings and crosses, and said that the former were only lined with gold, and that the substance was either silver or metal. The cushion in the centre of a thin coat of gold, and the value of each would probably be about 4s. or 5s. The crosses were of the same description of material, and the value of each would be about 3s. or 4s. The prisoner was committed for trial.

NOTTINGHAM.—JUSTICES' JUSTICE. On Sunday last the town of Nottingham was thrown into rather a feverish state of excitement, in consequence of three men being committed to prison, charged with having broken the Sabbath by playing at cricket. Many persons, like so many Pharisees, were horrified at the "offence," was the eager inquiry of the spectators "surely it is not another Sutton-Bonington burglary?" "No," replied a grave-looking person, "not so bad as that; they say it's a highway robbery." These questions and answers induced further inquiries, when it transpired that the men had been caught "committing the very serious offence of stepping off the foot path into a field," and, "that they had actually played at cricket!" Such was Mr. Edge's keeper. We shall not trouble our readers with any observations upon the profanation of the Sabbath, by sending men through the town on that day in custody, and the creating a public excitement at a time which ought to be held sacred, although it was done by direction of a magistrate who has for years been accustomed to hear read, at the quarter sessions and assizes the proclamation "for the suppression of vice, profaneness, and blasphemy." Mr. T. W. Edge is a magistrate of the county, and has the shooting over the lordship of Bulborough, which comprises Woodborough. His keepers apprehended these men, as they say, for trespassing and throwing a stone at them when by the side of a wood; and by his direction they were sent to gaol. On Wednesday the case was heard, and the gamekeeper was completely contradicted by the witnesses for the defence, and the defendants discharged. Thus three men were unjustly imprisoned from Sunday until Wednesday, and discharged, without any compensation, and labouring under the stigma of having been in gaol. Can it be surprising that an opinion should be prevalent, that "there is one law for the rich, and another for the poor?" [We copy the above from the last number of the Nottingham Mercury, and but for the respectability of our worthy contemporary and the subsequent proceedings before the magistrates, we could hardly believe in the truth of the narrative. Assuming that the facts are as stated, we have no hesitation in declaring that Mr. Edge is unfitted not only to hold the commission of the peace but also to mix in civilized society. We know how dangerous it is to meddle with edge tools, but it is our duty to the public will induce us at no distant date to return to a discussion of this gentleman's qualifications for the magistracy; and, in the meantime, we recommend him to the marked contempt of the Nottingham magistrates (including the Lord-Lieutenant of the county) and the particular notice of the Lord Chancellor.]

IRELAND.

THE STATE TRIALS.—POSTPONEMENT OF THE JUDGMENT.

The Court of Queen's Bench was crowded from an early hour on Thursday morning, in anticipation of hearing judgment given on the new trial motion in the long protracted trial of the Queen v. O'Connell.

Shortly before 11 o'clock Mr. Justice Crampton came into court, when the gentlemen took the necessary steps previous to the magistrates, and one by one the Lord Chancellor. Mr. Justice Crampton then retired, and the bench remained vacant up to four o'clock

At three o'clock the Attorney-General came into court, and after remaining a few minutes, withdrew to the Crown consultation room.

It was generally believed that the judges were in consultation in the chamber from seven o'clock, on the subject of changing the period of the Summer Assizes from August to October.

At four o'clock Mr. Justice Burton took his seat on the bench, when the grand jurors for the city and county of the city of Dublin, the Sheriffs' Tamers, the foreman of the City, and the Hon. Sir. John Butler foreman of the County Grand Jury.

The Chief Justice and Mr. Justice Crampton afterwards entered and took their seats. The Lord Chief Justice addressed the Attorney-General as follows:—

"Mr. Attorney-G neral, I have to state to you that the Court has appointed Friday morning next for giving judgment in the case of the Queen against O'Connell."

This announcement caused considerable surprise; and the Crown Lawyers having immediately retired, the Court, which was subsequently occupied with motions of course, soon became quite deserted.

Mr. O'Connell arrived in Dublin on Wednesday morning.

REPEAL ASSOCIATION.—At the weekly meeting on Monday, in the Conciliation Hall, the amount of Repeal rent for the week was announced to be £380.

There have not been seen so many "young barristers" at any one Repeal meeting as were congregated on Monday in Conciliation Hall, and almost all taking an active part in the proceedings. Mr. O'Neil Daunt (who is not a barrister), harped much on the proposal of the Courts of Law to the effect of the Vice Royalty being abolished. "Look," he said, "at the arguments for abolishing the Lord Lieutenancy. Repeal transits, steam conveyance annihilating distance, and the whole batch under the same Executive—a notion of that foolish and mischievous notion of separate nationality—economy in the public expenditure, and so forth. Was not every word of all this just as applicable to the abolition of the Irish judicature? Why encourage a feeling of separate nationality by sending suitors to Dublin instead of to London? Consolidate the Irish Chancery, Queen's Bench, Common Pleas, Exchequer, with the corresponding courts at Westminster; steam conveyances will waft Irish clients over to Westminster Hall in sixteen hours; the intermixture thus produced will fuse the two races together, by teaching them to look up for their law to the same tribunals; a great saving in the treasury can be effected by abolishing the present Irish judgeships, and adding some half dozen new judges, at reduced salaries, to the staff at Westminster; as for the Irish circuits, you can very easily get aspiring English lawyers to assume their duties and practice as journeymen judges; the whole plan would be as valuable, not inexpensive, and thoroughly consistent item in the centralising system. Why then hesitate to consign the Four Courts, as you already have consigned the Royal Exchange and the Custom-house, and as you now threaten to consign the Viceregal Palace, to the owls and the bats, to emptiness, decay, and desolation. Are the Conservative lawyers of Ireland prepared for these conclusions? If not, let them unite with us, and we will stand in time, and resume with us this colossal opposition to strip Ireland of every institution calculated to give dignity and importance to the kingdom, and to return the expenditure of Irish money in Ireland.

POSTPONEMENT OF JUDGMENT.—It is stated that the Government has become to the determination of postponing the assize circuits, usually held in July, to the 1st of September, in order to equalise the periods for the two circuits held within the year. It was in contemplation to hold a third, or autumn circuit in England; but strong objections appeared against this arrangement. Besides, owing to the great decrease of crime in this country, there would be no assize business to warrant a third circuit within the year.

Robert Latouche, Esq., of Harristown, in the county of Kildare, died on Tuesday evening.

A large quantity of copper coins, of the reign of Elizabeth, amounting to fourteen pounds weight, was last week by a labourer, while digging a field in the townland of Brigh, barony of Enniskowen. The place where they were discovered is within a mile or two of Malin Head, the most northerly point of Ireland. The figure "1591" is distinctly legible upon them.

Bantry Bay has been the scene of great excitement, in consequence of a shoal of whales having entered the harbour. An immense number were secured, the value of which is computed at £1500.

THE LATE FORGERY ON THE BANK.—On Tuesday, Lennon, one of the men charged with the late forgery on the Bank of Ireland, was arrested near Athlone by one of the detective force of police: 360 sovereigns were found on his person and in the apartment in which he was staying.

FORGERY ON THE BANK OF IRELAND.—At College-street Police-office on Monday, James Crassan, a servant out of place, was charged with obtaining the sum of £450, the property of the Governor and Company of the Bank of Ireland, on a draft purporting to be signed by Mr. Arthur Murray, a builder, in Dublin.

John Irwin, a teller in the bank, deposed that the draft was handed to him by James Harding, one of the bank porters, to whom he handed four notes of £100 each, and £50 in small notes.—Henry Greves, another teller, stated that he gave gold for those notes to the prisoner.—Crassan said that he went with a man named Lennon to the bank on the day charged, the 17th of May. The latter had him hand in the draft, and got a card in return. That he then desired the prisoner to get notes for the cash, which he did. The large notes were exchanged at another desk for gold; and when he handed the company of the Bank of Ireland, actual gave him back a parcel of five small notes. The amount he did not know, as he was drunk, and Lennon fled. Harding, the bank porter, had also fled.—The prisoner was committed for trial.

EXECUTION OF TWO MEN IN KENAGH.—On Saturday last, at one o'clock, James Hickey, convicted of the murder of a man named Hanly, at Green-hall, and John Cooke, for the murder of Nowlan, near Rosorea, underwent the last penalty of the law in Kenagh gaol. Hickey was a young man, about thirty-six years of age, was married, but had no children. His wife was permitted to see him a few days since, to bid him farewell for ever, when the scene was deeply affecting. Cooke is but a young lad, scarcely seventeen years. His father and mother are alive, and reside in Connel. Hickey declared his innocence of Hanly's murder—that he had neither hand, art, or part in it—that he was never concerned in a robbery, or in the taking of fire-arms. He died without a struggle. Cooke declared his guilt, and acknowledged the justice of his sentence, and said there was no one else concerned in the murder of Nowlan but himself and Hayden. He begged the prayers of the people, and after the drop fell, he appeared to suffer much, his body being frequently agitated with convulsive throes for seven or eight minutes. After hanging the usual time, the bodies were lowered down, and placed in coffins, and interred within the walls of the prison.

POLICE.

BOW STREET.—EXTENSIVE ROBBERY AT BUCKINGHAM PALACE. On Tuesday, an investigation of considerable importance was taken before Mr Hall, chief magistrate of the metropolis, at Bow-street, in his private room in a surgeon, named Lowther, residing in Upper Belgrave-street, was brought up in custody of Inspector Steed, of the A division, charged with having in his possession a quantity of valuable property belonging to her Majesty; and Elizabeth Lovejoy, and Ellen Lovejoy, the sisters, were charged with stealing the same from Buckingham Palace. Earl De La Warr, the Lord Chamberlain, was present, as well as Sir William Martin, the Inspector of Palaces, and Mr. Saunders, the Superintendent of the Queen's Palace. The two females were laundresses at Buckingham Palace; and had been there and at St. James's Palace, in the service of the late King, for fifteen years. The male prisoner lodged in Mr. Hammond's house, and several things he had lately been seen to come to him, which excited the curiosity of the people with whom he lodged. During his absence, a few days since, the inmates of the house broke open his box, and found they contained articles of plate, and the boxes were taken away by the police, under the direction of the Lord Chamberlain. The whole affair was, however, kept quite still, with the exception of the knowledge of many persons, until yesterday week, when the two females were taken into custody, and then the two females were arrested in the palace. Having sent the goods away by the cart of the man who fetched the dirty clothes of the palace, with orders to leave them at Mr. Hammond's house, in Upper Eaton-street. The female prisoners alleged in their defence that they had used their own linen at the Palace till it was worn out, in consequence of there having been a short supply of linen sent to the wash, and rendered them all that was taken from the Palace produced to repay themselves. The male prisoner declared that he was entirely ignorant that the property had been stolen, his sisters having told him that it was their own property which induced them to purchase it. Mr. Martin denied there was a short supply of linen at the Palace, and proved that that which was produced was quite new, having been only recently supplied to the Palace. Mr. Hall said the case was very clear, and remanded them all three previous to a committal. They were removed to Tothil-fields Prison in the common prison van.

MARYLEBONE.—On Wednesday John Walker, a man about forty-five years of age, was brought up in custody, and placed at the bar before Mr. Rawlinson, charged with having attempted to obtain money from Mr. Charles Dickens (Boz), No. 1, Devonshire-street, Piccadilly, by means of false and fraudulent representations. The prisoner seemed in great distress of mind, and in the course of the inquiry frequently shed tears.—It appeared that Mr. Dickens had frequently relieved the prisoner in his distress, although he knew nothing of him whatever, until at last, after the most importunate solicitations, he instituted an inquiry, and found that, although the tale of distress was true enough, yet that many of his representations, such as the death of his wife, &c., were fabricated. For the purpose of stimulating the generosity of his benefactor. He considered he had no alternative. Mr. Burgen, the chief clerk to the Mendicity Society, proved that on the previous evening, between seven and eight o'clock, he went to 5, Mitre-street, and the door was opened by a child. The prisoner, who came down, led him into a back kitchen, and, in answer to questions, he said he was in very great distress, so much so, as to be totally unable to procure even a scanty meal. Witness told him that he thought it was a great pity that his wife did'nt take in needle work, to help to support her family, when he said she had been ill, but was now much better, and that she would soon get out to employ. Upon the prisoner's admission that his wife was living, he (prisoner) was given into custody, and after he was locked up, witness went back to the house, where he saw the two poor children, who were evidently in very great distress. He gave the poor woman a trifle from his own pocket, and afterwards sent to the station-house, and afforded relief to the prisoner; he had previously ascertained that the wife had recently been very ill.—Mr. Rawlinson (to Mr. Burgen).—The prisoner is not doing well.—Witness: but here is a case of great distress, and that distress is proved out of the mouth of your own officer; after that do you really wish me to commit this man?—Mr. Knyvett: No, no, by no means.—Mr. Rawlinson (to the prisoner): What have you to say Prisoner (after some hesitation, and in a faint tone of voice): I wrote that last letter at the eleventh hour, when we were so badly off, that I knew not what to do. I am truly penitent for the fault in saying that my wife was dead, but my motive was good, as we had not a bit of bread to eat; I have been a clerk and accountant, and from the period of losing my last situation, I have not been able to support my family. Mr. Rawlinson: You are evidently a man of good education, but it cannot be denied, and even you admit it yourself, that you put forth a falsehood in your last letter to Mr. Dickens. Under all the circumstances, you are discharged, and I am very sorry that you have been brought here.—The man burst into tears, and before he quitted the court several persons relieved him.

THAMES OFFICE.—MURDER AND ROBBERY.—James Hanstead, a dock foreman; Alexander Nicholson, a milk man; and two sisters, named Mary Ann Ash and Rosetta Brugger, were brought before Mr. Ballantine, at the Thames Police Court, on a charge of having assaulting and robbing Mr. Williams: You are evidently a man of good education, but it cannot be denied, and even you admit it yourself, that you put forth a falsehood in your last letter to Mr. Dickens. Under all the circumstances, you are discharged, and I am very sorry that you have been brought here.—The man burst into tears, and before he quitted the court several persons relieved him.

Coffee.—Coylon has moved off slowly, at 44s to 52s for good ordinary. Most other kinds of sale remain heavy, at late rates.

Cocoa.—This article is heavy, yet prices are supported.

Pepper.—Bengal is in improved request, at very full prices. At auction, good white has sold at 9½d per lb., middling 11½ to 11¾d, and fine 12½d to 13d per lb. net.

Provisions.—There is more business doing in Irish butter, the prices of which are steadily supported. Prime new Waterford has sold at 84s, and new Limerick, for arrival, 80s per cwt. Dutch butter is again cheaper, with a heavy inquiry. The best bacon moves off slowly, other kinds slowly, at prices varying from 40s to 48s per cwt for middles. Other kinds of provisions are very dull.

Oil.—In cocoa nut oil comparatively little is doing, but unsold are rather more in demand. Olive is without alteration. Palm is very quiet. A few casks of several have been taken on the spot at 40s 7d to 40s 6d, for forward delivery the price is 41s 6d to 41s 9d per cwt

Oils.—Lisbon Malaga, 38s 6d; West Barbary, 36s 6d; Whale, 19s; Clark and Co., 17s; Gas or 30s; Hotspur, 29s 6d; East Retford, 31s; Wallace, 28 6d; Adelaide, 22s; Tees, 52s. per ton.

Hops.—A decided increase of fly being observed in nearly, or quite, the whole of the plantations in Kent, Sussex, and Worcester—from the warm weather having brought on a rapid growth. The demand continues very limited, and full prices are obtained for all descriptions of hops. Sussex pockets £5 5s to £5 15s; Weald of Kent 6s. £6 12s to £7; Mid Kent 6s. £10, Dukes bags, £7 to £8 15s; East Kent pockets, £7 to £8; Choice do, £10 to £11 Wool.—Nearly 20,000 bales of colonial wool have been imported this week. Privately, the demand is inactive at late rates

Potatoes.—For all kinds of potatoes we have a very inactive inquiry, at prices varying from 60s to 80s per ton.

Smithfield.—Although our market to-day was by no means heavily supplied with beasts—the first arrivals not exceeding 200 Scots, chiefly from Aberdeen, the beef trade was in a very sluggish state. However, the best qualities of beef sold at Monday's quotations, but the inferior descriptions receded 2d. per 8lbs. The number of sheep being large, the sale for them was heavy, and the rates had a downward tendency. The lamb trade—owing to the large arrivals—was unusually dull, at an abatement of from 2d. to 4d. per 8lbs. Calves were in large supply, and barely inquiry, at a reduction of 2d. per 8lbs. Most kinds of pigs went off on easier terms. Milch cows were a dull sale, at prices varying from £16 10s. to £19 5s each

Per 8lbs., to sink the offal:—Coarse and inferior beasts, 2s 2d to 2s 4d; second quality do, 2s 6d to 2s 8d; prime large oxen, 2s 10d to 3s 0d; prime Scots, &c., 3s 0d to 3s 2d; coarse and inferior sheep, 2s 6d to 2s 8d; second quality ditto, 3s 0d to 3s 2d; prime coarse woolled sheep, 3s 4d to 3s 6d; prime Southdowns ditto, 3s 10d to 4s 0d; large coarse calves 3s 2d to 4s 0d; prime small do. 4s 2d to 4s 6d; large hogs, 3s 0d to 3s 2d; neat small pork, 3s 8d to 4s 2d. Lambs, 4s 8d to 5s 8d. Suckling calves, 18l to 22s and quarter old store pigs, 9s 6d to 20s each. Beasts, 252; sheep and lambs, 1,280; calves, 351; pigs, 260

Newgate and Leadenhall.—We had a very heavy demand here, to-day, on the following terms.—Per 8lbs., by the carcass: Inferior beef, 2s 0d to 2s 4d; middling ditto, 2s 6d to 2s 8d; prime large ditto, 2s 10d to 3s 0d; ditto small do., 3s 2d to 3s 4d; large pork, 2s 4d to 2s 6d; inferior mutton, 2s 4d to 2s 8d; middling ditto, 2s 8d to 3s 0d; prime ditto, 3s 2d to 3s 4d; veal, 3s 0d to 4s 4d; small pork, 3s 4d to 4s 0d; lamb, 4s 6d to 5s 8d.

COMMERCE AND MONEY.

The transactions on the Exchequer Bill Stock Exchange since our last publication have been few in number, in their amount, and without any public interest whatever, with the exception of the retention of Bank of England Stock, which, in the middle of the week, advanced from 2 to 3 per cent. In all the shares of the Joint Stock Banks, the inter-communication has been unusually small. The money interest, likewise, now ask higher rates for the discount of bills of exchange, and for loans of money, which, as soon as the alterations proposed in the Bank Charter come into operation, must, from necessity, become much more frequent than at present, and consequently, must be dearer; that is to say, the scarcer money becomes, the cheaper must be the produce of land, and of all other commodities, which our farmers and manufacturers, however, think are already too low either for the prosecution, with profit, of commerce, or for the prosperous cultivation of the fields at home. Our funded debt, therefore, under these pecuniary prospects, is less the object of the capitalist for the employment of money than it has latterly been, and prices of any description of fixed stocks are without any material alteration. The Exchequer Bills and India Bonds, on the contrary, have been somewhat increased from 2 to 4 above our last quotations. For the time accounts, and for money, the same figures denote the prices of the Consols.

In the Share Market a considerable degree of dullness has prevailed during the week, and the prices of some of them have partially declined. The proprietors of the Birmingham line are in the midst of two competing lines being intersate in, which will, of course, be ruinous, and hence the considerable decline which has latterly occurred in the value of these shares. It will, however, be years before the completion of the one or the other, in addition to these and the other leading north through Lincolnshire, can draw away any great proportion of the traffic of the Birmingham line, and, therefore, the depreciated prices cannot be regarded as in the York and North Midland, and in those of the Great North of England, a decline of 2½ per share must be quoted. With these exceptions, however, the channel for the invest ment of money appears to display a healthy and sound appearance.

On the Foreign Stock Exchange foreign securities naturally participate in the dulness existing this week in the English money market, although no instance can be quoted of any fall in prices be noted. For the bonds of the Northern States of Europe, and for those of Holland and of Belgium, the last intelligence is unusually satisfactory, and the bonds of Spain have been well supported under these circumstances. For Spanish Bonds, the demand on the part of speculators has increased since last week, and prices are about one per cent dearer. A fair amount of business has also been done in the securities of the Italian and German States. Those of Chili and of Brazil cannot be purchased without causing a small improvement in their value. Mexicans are now half per cent dearer, and Peruvians have again invested in those of Buenos Ayres. Peru and Colombia at is a prices. This channel for the investment of surplus capital is therefore on a sound condition.

On the Royal Exchange last post day the supply of bills drawn on the Continent was again large but the large impor ations now making of foreign agricultural produce has so materially increased the demand for foreign remittance, that the rates of exchange on all foreign exchanges were less in favour of this country than they have been for many months past Still there are sufficiently high for further importations of the precious metals into this country, by which the amount of the money must be again increased, unless the limitations of the paper issues of metallic money to support the deficiency in the currency

Gentlemen.—I think it but an act of justice to inform you of the benefit I have derived from the use of your admirable MACASSAR OIL. About six months ago I found my hair getting daily more weak and thin, and soon described from a portion I had acquired of wetting it constantly, fearing that I should lose it entirely, and hearing of the efficacy of your Macassar Oil, I have for some time past constantly used it, and the result is, that my hair is now perfectly restored and much improved in appearance and colour, having become thick, dark, and glossy; it also curls freely without the use of paper, which it never did before. To all my friends I have warmly recommended your Macassar Oil as an excellent restorative and preservative for the hair. As I have an objection to see my name in print, I beg you will not publish it, but you are at liberty to show this letter, or make any other use you please of it, and refer applicants to me, if necessary, in proof of the efficacy of your Macassar Oil.

I remain, Gentlemen, your obedient servant, * * * * *

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

No. 109, Vol. IV.] FOR THE WEEK ENDING SATURDAY, JUNE 1, 1844. [Sixpence.

CURRENCY AND THE INCOME TAX.

RARELY, we admit, has any Minister carried a measure with so little opposition, as Sir Robert Peel has met with, in his plan for regulating the Currency. It is true, it is but a slight modification of the existing system: the extension of a settled principle rather than the enunciation of a new one, and the Bank of England is more affected by the regulation than the public at large. As the Bank accepted the terms of the Premier, there was no other interest whose welfare was immediately, or at least visibly, perilled; what has been for some years past being the thing that shall be, none stood forth in opposition, and the plan passed unopposed. Party spirit seemed for once charmed to sleep; some did not understand the intricacies of the subject, and feared to criticise lest they should blunder; so they concealed their ignorance in silence. Others thought it useless to resist the inevitable, and remained quiescent, though not perhaps assenting; and others again commended it altogether; and among them were several whom the Premier has generally to meet as opponents; but they, claiming much of the plan as their own, approved its adoption as an acknowledgment of their own ability, and characterised it as something little short of the perfection of financial wisdom.

Thus the plan passed; but one thing in connection with the matter has caused us some surprise, and strikes us as a great omission. Throughout all the discussion on the new arrangement of the Bank of England, what mention has been made of the Income Tax in connection with the Currency? It might, we think, have been introduced. We hear of immense masses of gold in the vaults of the Bank—stores of bullion, compared with which the treasures of the Roman Emperors sink into petty hoards. We listen to debates in which wealth appears the only thing existing; to judge by them we might be thought the most prosperous nation in existence. And yet at the very same moment, so much has the power of the people to consume or buy taxed articles diminished, that the current revenue of the country can only be raised by a tax, never before resorted to except in time of war and in the last extremity of financial embarrassment. We are at the present time living as a nation, not on the means that arise from year to year from the usual taxes on the luxuries and necessaries consumed by the people—the amount of which is an unerring index of their social comfort—but on a tax unjust in its principle, unequal in its operation, and most iniquitous in its mode of collection. It is unjust in its principle, because it taxes alike the real solid property, gained without toil, or inherited without exertion, in the same manner, and to the same extent, as the variable and uncertain income derived from precarious professions, depending on the slightest accidents, diminished by every cessation from toil, whether forced or voluntary, and liable to be totally destroyed by the visitation of bodily or mental disease, to which all men are liable. Nothing can be more glaringly unjust than thus placing on the same level, Income and Property. The last is often "got without merit," while the former is frequently "lost without deserving." There is so little in common between the wealthy landowner, or the holder of the public funds, and the struggling classes of Income makers, but who rarely amass any amount of fixed property, that subjecting them to the same exaction, amounts to absolute oppression. We pass over the many objections that were made at the time the tax was imposed, and which still exist, to the mode of its collection, with its inquisitorial action, or the abuse of the powers of the law, by which the quota upon all Incomes is seized, though those of a certain amount are specially exempted, and the objections to the forms of application for the refunding the portion thus confiscated, which are made so intricate that it is next to impossible to get anything back, however just may be the title to it. We pass over all this, for the sake of what is the greatest marvel of modern times, the apathy with which the people sit down under such an impost. If they think that the infliction is only temporary, and will end with the term fixed by the act, we believe they will find themselves grievously mistaken; and their present silence and apparent contentment, for certainly there is nothing real in it, will be alleged as good reasons for continuing it. Why should a Minister remove a burden of which he will say there are no complaints? It is a tax too convenient, too productive, and too certain (for with none can "the screw" be so well applied, and the same machinery will do as well to raise ten per cent. as three-and-a-half), to be given up; it saves a vast deal of trouble too; it is so easy to thrust the fingers of the tax-collector into the pockets of all with a tolerable certainty of finding enough in them to repay the visitation, that no Minister will go into all the intricacies of the question of indirect taxation, balancing values, and exports and imports, while he can resort to a plan which approaches so nearly "the good old rule" of taking where there is the power to take, without farther thought in the matter. Any statesman may get a surplus revenue if he will take this means of raising it; it is but a minor sort of confiscation of the property of the kingdom; and so far from considering the adoption of it by Sir R. Peel, as a proof of the wisdom of his policy, we rather think it a discredit; for it would have been a far greater achievement to have restored the imports and consumption of the people to the standard that enabled the usual taxes to defray the current expenses of the state. It would have been better to have increased the elasticity of the spring than to have laid an additional weight upon it. It might have been difficult, we grant; but difficulties, if overcome, form the statesman's triumph. As the case stands at present, the tax is heavy, the collectors active, the Exchequer inexorable, the expenditure as great as ever, the revenue from other quarters diminished to an enormous extent by fraud and smuggling, and the people as apathetic as if they had no voice in their own government. If they do not soon arouse themselves, it will be too late.

SURREY ZOOLOGICAL GARDENS.

The liberal proprietor of these gardens, which opened on Monday, has prepared a most splendid treat for his summer visitors. A new grand Model of London in the olden time, painted by Danson and Telbin, representing old St. Paul's, London-bridge, "choked up with houses," Baynard's Castle, and a variety of other objects, associated more or less with our reading, has been constructed on the site, where Hecla and Vesuvius "once raged before," making us wonder how such a monster-phœnix, as our metropolis is at present, could have risen from the ashes of 1666. The day and twilight view of this set piece of art is extremely imposing—the perspectives being managed with consummate skill. The outlines or edges of the buildings are "softened away to nothingness," and are lost in a blended harmony with the sky beyond, while the more prominent parts and foregrounds stand out in bold relief, with all the truth of reality. It is, in our opinion, a better pictorial illusion than any that preceded it, and is highly creditable to the artistical heads and hands of those who have produced it. The idea of first illuminating the old city is ingenious, it shows a number of otherwise obscure localities to the greatest advantage; and the subsequent conflagration presents a truly splendid appearance, reflected as it is in the water beneath, which gives one the idea of old Father Thames weeping

"Crimson tears for loss of some thing lov'd!"

The menagerie, as usual, was highly attractive; and an excellent band, under the superior direction of Godfrey, could not fail to be a harmonious contrast to the dissonance of the Scotch Pipers, who were present. Amongst the lesser attractions of the day, General Tom Thumb made his appearance. The gardens were most numerously attended.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

(From our own Correspondent.)

PARIS, May 28.

SPAIN.

Our last accounts from Madrid are to the 21st; they are utterly destitute of interest. The papers of the 20th contain long articles of the formalities of the departure of the two Queens and the Infanta, for Catalonia; four of the Ministers remained in Madrid. The Municipal Elections, which had commenced, would, it is said, end in the return of the Ministerial candidates, a misunderstanding having arisen in the ranks of the Opposition. Private letters state—I know not on what ground—that a great coolness existed between the Minister for Foreign Affairs ad interim and the French Ambassador, who accused General Narvaez of paying too much attention to Mr. Bulwer. A decree has been issued, subject to the approbation of the Cortes, relating to the widow and children of the late General Leon a pension of 45,000 reals (about £440.)

A felucca, called the San Rafael, laden with contraband goods, worth £12,000, has been seized near to San Lucar de Barrameda, and has been snatched by the house of Lanos and Co., of Gibraltar, for seville. The negotiations for a reconciliation with the Court of Rome was being carried on with great activity, under the auspices of Christina, and with great probability of final success. Several petty affairs had taken place between the royal troops and the Carlists: in one of them the Carlist chief, Cobo, and two of his officers, were made prisoners, and shot the same day.

ITALY.

Great alarm was experienced about the beginning of the month throughout Italy, but particularly in the kingdom of Naples, owing to the drought, which threatened a famine; fortunately on the 20th and 21st, sufficient rain fell to refresh the earth and promote vegetation.

The efforts made by various Bible Societies, and particularly by the Christian Society of New York, to produce reform amongst the Papal States, greatly occupied the attention of the Pope, and the most rigorous instructions had been forwarded to all Papal legates and every Court in Italy.

The King of Bavaria, who is making the tour of Italy, arrived at Florence on the 14th, and Rome on the 16th—the same day he visited the Pope.

GERMANY.

Count Maurice de Dietrichstein, the Austrian Minister to King Leopold, had arrived en congé in the Austrian capital. It was reported that, after passing the summer in Germany, the Count would be sent as Ambassador to London.

A letter from Frankfort says that Baron A. de Rothschild having withdrawn the donation of 100,000 florins, proposed by him ten years since for the erection of a new synagogue in Frankfort, because the Consistory thought fit to introduce into the religious ceremonies certain reforms which the Baron could not approve of, several organs of the German press have interpreted this act, which was dictated only by a pure scruple of conscience, as an act of intolerant fanaticism. This absurd reproach, adds the writer, is rendered completely false and unfounded by an act which must convince the most prejudiced how far the honourable banker is from being fettered by any such religious prejudices. At the very moment of withdrawing his promised donation, he invested double the sum, or 200,000 florins, in the public funds, which, by a legal and public document, he secured in perpetuity, so that the interest might be distributed annually among the indigent families of Frankfort, whatever form of worship they might follow.

Prince Kraner, Bishop of Posen, in his diocese on the 16th instant.

It was generally believed in Vienna that the marriage between the Grand Duchess Olga of Russia and the Archduke Stephen of Austria would be celebrated in the month of October, in the Austrian capital, in the presence of the Emperor Nicholas.

SWITZERLAND.

The civil war in Switzerland may be considered at an end. The journals received yesterday state that the forces of Upper Valais had been completely successful in their conflict with those of Lower Valais, and that the latter were so disorganized that there was little chance of their being able to rally. The question of convoking an extraordinary Diet for the adoption of measures for the maintenance of general tranquility, had been resolved affirmatively by several of the Grand Councils.
